(Dictated July 5)

Dear Dr. Nathan:

Thank you for your letter of June 12th.

I am sorry that there has been no opportunity for us to talk as you suggested, and I am now about to leave the city for several weeks.

I, too, have pleasant memories of our earlier association. Perhaps we can arrange to meet when I return in the fall.

Sincerely,

Dear Mr. Murrow:

I was interested to learn that you dealt one evening last week with the passport case that has become attached to my name. I believe there are several crucial problems involved which are of general interest. Since I wondered whether you might like to discuss them on one of your programs, I called your office to say that I should like to talk with you over the phone whenever you have a minute to do so.

I have thought very frequently of the pleasant association with you when you were with the Institute of International Education in the early years of Hitler's regime. It would be a great pleasure to renew our acquaintance.

With kindest regards.

Cordially yours,

Otto Nathan

Dear Mr. Murrow:

We are very grateful to you for taking time out the other day to have your picture taken with Tommy Woodward our 1956 Poster Boy.

The reason for the rush in this case was that the boy is going to enter the hospital shortly for a minor operation and will not be in New York again until our campaign is under way.

Thanks again for your help.

Dear Ed:

Enclosed is a news release on Arnold M. Johnson, Kappa Sigma's Man-of-the-Year for 1955.

Also enclosed is a broadside sent to me by Ed Gund, Chairman of the Banquet Committee in Kansas City.

It is our hope that you might be able to mention this award on your radio broadcast on Friday night, December 9th, since that would give us pretty wide coverage throughout the country.

Of course anything you can do for us in that respect will be deeply appreciated.

FOR IMMEDIATE RELEASE

Kansas City, Missouri

Arnold M. Johnson, the man who brought major league baseball to Kansas City, has been named "Man of the Year" by the Kappa Sigma social fraternity and will receive the award here Friday, December 9th.

The announcement was made by George H. Reymond, Baton Rouge, Louisiana, President and Worthy Grand Master of the fraternity which has more than 60,000 members and chapters at 127 colleges and universities throughout the United States and Canada.

Presentation of the award will be made at the fraternity's 19th annual "Man of the Year" dinner, to be held in the ballroom of the Continental Hotel. 500 persons are expected to attend the event scheduled for 5:30 p.m. A dinner at 7 p.m. will be followed by a dance with music by Ken White and his orchestra.

This marks the first time that the national award dinner will be staged in Kansas City. In addition, the Golden Anniversary of the Greater Kansas City Alumni Association of Kappa Sigma and the 86th Anniversary of the fraternity will be observed.

Johnson, 48-year-old owner of the Kansas City Athletics and a widely-known Chicago financier, becomes the first man primarily associated with the field of athletics to receive the award. LOOK Magazine has described him as "Baseball's Most Exciting Owner". In his first year as owner of the A's, the baseball club, one of baseball's proudest teams, shattered its all-time home attendance record from Philadelphia. Approximately 1,400,000 saw the A's play in Kansas City in 1955. Johnson is vice-chairman of the board of the Canteen Company of America, a firm which does a $100,000,000.-a-year business in the vending machine field. Johnson became a member of the fraternity at the University of Chicago where he was graduated in 1928.

Previous winners of the award include Lowell Thomas, author and news commentator; Edward R. Murrow, news commentator who presents the television program, "Person to Person"; Hoagy Carmichael, entertainer; Senator Estes Kefauver; and Warren R. Austin, former U.S. chief delegate to the United Nations.

Robert B. Caldwell, who was honored as the Kappa Sigma Man of the Year of Greater Kansas City last year, a lawyer and chairman of the board of directos of the Cook Paint and Varnish Company and K.M.B.C., Kansas City, Missouri, will serve as Master of Ceremonies. Ernie Mehl, sports editor of the Kansas City Star, will narrate highlights and interesting sidelights in Johnson's career.

Members of the fraternity in the Greater Kansas City area who have been initiated for 50 years or more will also be honored. They are: Henry A. Bundschu, 601 West Maple, Independence; Robert B. Caldwell, 1215 West 57th Terrace; Louis R. Gates, 4146 Cambridge; Edward B. Delke, 5320 Belleview; Dr. Don C. Guffey, 1008 Valentine Rod; Harry H. Hodgson, 4504 West 65th; John M. Langsdale, 5600 Doniphan; Clif Langsdale, 840 West 57th Terrace;

Peace, 216 West Armour Blvd; James W. Shikles, Chase Hotel; George H. Bates, Jefferson City; Forest S. Lyman, Olathe, Kansas; and M. P. Whaley, Albany, Missouri.

Among the special guests will be George H. Reymond; Allen Whitfield, Des Moines, Iowa, National Vice President; Wesley W. Kergan, Carmel, California, National Secretary; Francis S. Van Derbur, Denver, Colorado, Past National President; and Warren S. Sivertsen, Virginia Beach, Virginia, National Public Relations Officer.

In addition to alumni and their wives, active members of the Kappa Sigma chapters at Kansas University, Missouri University, Kansas State College, Baker University, Washburn University and Nebraska University will attend.

Information concerning reservations may be made by telephoning Ed Gund, general chairman of the event, at R. B. Jones & Sons, Inc., Victor 1230.

Dear Ed:

For some time now, I have been working with Yugoslav developments, both here and there, in so-called scholarly works (I enclose the latest) and in popular pieces for the Saturday Evening Post and Harpers.

In June I am returning to Yugoslavia for a stay of five or six months. Despite help from the American Philosophical Society (The Ford Foundation, as you may know, declined) I will be on an academic shoestring. It occurred to me that there might be the possibility of some reporting or broadcasting for you from Yugoslavia.

I would appreciate any advise you have on this.

THE REFORMS IN YUGOSLAVIA

FRED WARNER NEAL

IN THE FIVE YEARS since the Yugoslav-Soviet split, the ideological, political, and economic complexion of Marshal Tito's Communist state has been altered in a number of basic respects. It is still too early to attempt to say how the new Yugoslav reforms will work out in practice. Particularly one does not know to what extent the new role of the Communist Party has in fact altered the balance of political power in Yugoslavia, or whether it has altered it at all. But the major reforms now seem to have been completed, at least on paper, and it is possible to summarize them and make some tentative, over-all conclusions.

Although the roots of the dispute between Tito and the Cominform antedate even the establishment of the Federative People's Republic of Yugoslavia,[1] for more than three years after the end of the war in Europe Yugoslavia appeared to the world west of the Iron Curtain (and doubtless too much of the world east of it too) as a model satellite. Most observers agree that Tito's dictatorship aped the Soviet Union in government, economics, and ideology with vigor and completeness.[2] It is not surprising, therefore, that when the Yugoslavs were finally expelled from the Soviet Union's Communist community,[3] they protested vehemently, although vainly, that they had been misunderstood and were in fact as loyal to the Soviet Union and its ideologies as their erstwhile fellow satellites.[4] For some time thereafter, the Yugoslav Communists, born and bred to believe that Stalin and the USSR were invariably right in all things but now forced by circumstances into a position of staunch opposition to Stalin and the USSR, suffered from a sort of political schizophrenia, noticeable not only in domestic affairs but in foreign policy as well.

[3] It is often forgotten that Tito did not willingly withdraw from the Cominform but was forced out, much against his will. Cf. M. S. Handler, "Communist Dogma and Jugoslav Practice," Foreign Affairs, Vol. XXX, No. 3 (April, 1952).

[4] For example, Tito, concluding his report to the Fifth Congress of the Yugoslav Communist Party, right after publication of the Cominform resolution, declared: "At the end, comrades, I should like to emphasize that we shall work with all our might to mend the relations between our Party and the CPSU (B)," Political Report of the Central Committee of the Communist Party of Yugoslavia, Belgrade, 1948.

ever, soon drove Tito and his ideologues into a reconsideration of their entire position. Not only was there a need to come forward with an ideological basis for their position as a Communist nation outside the Stalinist community, but the discovery that Soviet-brand Communism was not for them in at least one respect brought them to an examination of other aspects of it as well. Freed perforce from the necessity of conforming to Soviet practices and thought, the Yugoslav leaders developed a new outlook, not only on Communism in Yugoslavia and in the Soviet Union but on Marxism and the world generally. Out of it has evolved—and is still evolving—a new theory of socialism, democracy, and capitalism, and a whole set of political and administrative practices designed to put the new theory into effect in Yugoslavia. One important aspect of this process was what might be termed a spiritual change on the part of the Yugoslav Communists themselves. In discussions with Westerners, they began to take an attitude different from the impervious, suspicious, and hostile attitude so typical of the Muscovites. The writer remembers listening to the late Boris Kidrič[5] in the fall of 1950 talk for an entire evening about how he was "duped" by Soviet ideas.[6]

By the spring of 1950, the Yugoslav Communists had begun to formulate both new theories and new methods for running a Communist society. The ensuing three years have completely transformed Yugoslav thought, government, and economics, so that today the country is operating under a new-type constitution, with a new theory of the state, a new attitude toward collectivization, a new concept of public ownership and even a new role for the Communist Party.

The new face of Yugoslavia is still entirely Marxist—but not Soviet—in its outlook. It is based on the general idea that Socialism as it has developed in the Soviet Union under Stalin is a definite deviation from true Marxism-Leninism. The root of the trouble, as the Yugoslavs see it, has been the creation in the USSR of an independent Communist bureaucracy which has been able to establish a dictatorship not for, but over, the proletariat and the masses of people. Thus, instead of the state apparatus withering away, as [5] Mr. Kidrič was then chairman of the Planning Commission and the Economic Council of Yugoslavia and a member of the Political Bureau of the Party.

[6] It was especially interesting to find this attitude in those Yugoslav officials who, prior to the rift with the Cominform, refused, Moscow style, to admit error in anything. Mr. Kidrič did not humble himself in this respect as far as some, who went so far in their "confessions" as to resemble witnesses at Communist purge trials.

Marxist theology foretells, the bureaucracy in the Soviet Union has not only perpetuated itself but has become stronger and bigger with no end to the growing process in sight. The Stalinist rationalization of this, that it is necessary as long as capitalist encirclement exists, is ridiculed by the Yugoslavs, who point to the non-capitalist satellites ringing the periphery of the Soviet Union.[7]

According to current Yugoslav dogma, nationalization of industry and management by the state is only the first, and the "lowest," form of Socialism.[8] The Soviet Union has become involved in a "contradiction" in that it has not—and, under its present set-up, cannot—progress beyond this.[9] The Soviet system is seen as nothing more than a form of state capitalism, in which the place of the former exploiting class is now taken by the state bureaucracy. Since the masses are still exploited, the state bureaucracy must, to maintain its position, become more and more dictatorial and less and less democratic. Stalinism is the "tsardom of mediocrity and darkness" and has "as much connection with Marxism and Socialism as have Gods with hatters. . . ."[10]

Democracy is seen as necessary to Socialism. And while Democracy does not mean necessarily—and especially not for Yugoslavia—a multi-party system, still the democratic methods evolved by the bourgeois capitalist states have something to recommend them.[11] Particularly is this so once the "exploiting elements" in society have been isolated and no longer represent a "clear and present danger" to socialist institutions.[12]

In any event, the important thing is to safeguard against bureaucratic state capitalism, and the way to do it is to begin at once the "withering away" process of the state.[13] This the Yugoslavs have sought to do by:

[7] Numerous Yugoslav publications are filled with this point of view. One of the best, and certainly the most official, expositions of it was given by Marshal Tito in an address to the Yugoslav Federal Assembly, quoted in the Communist Party newspaper, Borba, June 27, 1950.

1) Decentralizing state control of industry and planning.
2) Creating workers' groups in each factory with an authoritative voice in management.
3) Giving these workers' organs direct representation in the government at all levels.
4) Decentralizing many government functions by turning them over to the governments of the various republics and the local People's Committees.[14]

"Therein," said Tito, "lies our road to Socialism, and that is the only right road as regards the withering away of state functions in the economy." This, far from being a deviation, is seen as a return to basic Marxism-Leninism, from which the Soviet Union has strayed.[15]

The most basic reform of all—and the first major one—was that of giving workers a say in both management and control of the means of production by creating Workers' Councils and Management Boards in the factories. This law[16] was hailed by Tito as "the most significant historical act of the National Assembly," next to the original nationalization of industry.[17]

The law has taken exclusive control of industry from government departments, and their agent, the factory manager, and given substantial voice in management to the workers themselves. It provides for the creation of a Workers' Council in each factory, elected by all employees, with the following rights and duties:[18]

1) To elect from amongst the workers a Management Board, which then acts as an executive committee of the Council in managing the factory. The Council can dismiss the Management Board and must ratify its major decisions.

2) To draw up over-all basic plans for operation of the factory and to supervise the balance sheet of the enterprise. That is to say, the Workers' Council participates in the planning process, although for the most part only by ratifying actions of its Management Board.

3) To distribute that portion of the factory's profits left after new investment, taxes, and other expenses have been defrayed. Out of this come wages, and also expenditures for the employees' benefit, as is supposed to be the case with the so-called "director's fund" in the Soviet Union.

Under the law, workers in all the factories of an entire industry, forming a Higher Economic Association, also elect a Workers' Council, which in turn chooses a Management Board (sometimes referred to as Administrative Committee) to preside over industry-wide operations. It is this Administrative Committee which hires the managers of individual factories. Real management is carried on, under the law, by the manager and the Management Board, although the exact relationship between the two, detailed in Article 9 of the law, is complex and sometimes ambiguous.[19] Care is taken to see that actual workers, rather than professional or technical men, dominate the Management Boards. At least three-quarters of the membership must be "workers directly engaged in production, or otherwise in the basic productive activity of the enterprise."[20]

At each level, the workers' groups evolve plans for the industry, in conjunction with an official of the republic government involved, under the general, over-all plan. It is this decentralization of planning that is the second major reform.

Even before the end of the war, the Tito Government had seized industries in areas under its control. The method of operation in the thus-nationalized economy, prior to enactment of the new law, followed very closely that of the Soviet Union, whose experts had helped set up the system. A central plan set forth not only over-all production quotas but also quotas for specific industries and even individual factories. Prices, wages, profits, and investments were all planned from above. The system was characterized by rigid, bureaucratic controls and the absence of initiative on the part of individual producing units, which had, at best, only a slight, advisory voice in the planning process.[21]

national level is limited to fixing "basic proportions." These "basic proportions" involve in the main over-all production goals of basic materials, over-all investment in various economic branches, minimum wages,[22] tax rates, and over-all federal revenue. Initiative in detailed plans is now lodged with the republic governments, the industry-wide, worker-elected management organs, and in some cases individual factory units.[23]

Simultaneously, the financial system of "control by the dinar" was altered by administrative arrangements so that prices of manufactured goods bear a more realistic relationship to prices of consumer goods, and, within the framework of the plan, a relatively free market has been created among the various producing units. Prices are thus fixed by the law of supply and demand. The dinar has also been devalued to approximately its actual value compared with other currencies (300 to the dollar). The foreign trade monopoly has been broken up and this function turned over to the republic governments and the industry-wide management groups.[24]

These two reforms are inextricably connected, according to Yugoslav theorists. In order for the workers' control of industry to be meaningful, workers had to be given initiative and incentive, a voice in planning and the right to profit directly by their efforts, unrestricted by bureaucratic controls.[25] The two reforms together are also bound up with major changes in political organization.

First, workers are given direct representation in government through the creation of Producers' Councils as a part of the federal and republic parliaments, and as a part of the basic organs of local government, the People's Committees. Second, the federal economic administrative apparatus, previously embodied in multifold ministries, has been created in a separate category in order to divorce it from political power. Third, a great many federal administrative functions have been eliminated entirely and given over to the republic governments and to the People's Committees.

[22] Originally it was decided to fix minimum wages, which, if not payable out of a factory's profits, would be made up in large part by the state, with a variable part to be paid from extra profits. Now, however, it appears that, while a minimum is contemplated in the over-all economic plans, in fact the whole wage fund will be variable, that is, depending on the income of the factory. See Milentije Popović, the Yugoslav Finance Minister, "Concerning the Law on Budgets and the Basic Law on Social Contribution and Taxation," New Yugoslav Law, Nos. 1–2 (1952). This is the text of a speech delivered to the National Assembly on December 28, 1951.

These three major organizational changes are the basis of a sweeping constitutional reform that has resulted in a new basic law for Yugoslavia.[26] Greatest innovation of the new Constitution is probably the concept of worker representation in the Federal People's Assembly, as the parliament is now called. The 1946 Constitution provided for an assembly of two houses, one a Federal Council, popularly elected from the country as a whole, and the other a Council of Nationalities, elected on the basis of the republic and other nationality divisions of Yugoslavia. Under the new Constitution, the two houses of the Assembly are the Federal Council and the Council of Producers. The latter is elected by workers, artisans, and those peasants who are in cooperatives. It is a co-equal body of the Assembly, but with special rights in all economic matters. The Federal Council, under the new document, is composed both of deputies popularly elected from the country as a whole and of deputies elected by the popularly chosen chambers of the republics. These two types of deputies sit as a single body except on questions affecting the republics' status—such as constitutional changes. Then the latter group sits separately as a Council of Nationalities and has the right to decide whether or not the question shall be placed on the general agenda of the Assembly.[27]

The republic assemblies and, at the local level, the People's Committees, are also bicameral bodies, one chamber being in each case a Council of Producers.[28]

According to the theory of the new Yugoslav Constitution, the supreme body of the federal government is the Federal People's Assembly. This Assembly elects the executive agencies, a Federal Executive Council and the President of the Republic. The Executive Council, of which the president is chairman, has wide decree powers, which are, however, subject to disallowance by the Assembly. The Presidency is a powerful office, as evidenced by the fact that this is the job Tito now holds. In addition to being commander-in-chief of the armed forces and director of foreign affairs, the President may veto decisions of the Executive Council. In this case, however, he is bound to put the disputed matter before the Assembly. All this marks a distinct departure from the previous constitutional structure of the Soviet-type, in which a presidium acted for the Assembly but with actual power in the hands of the premier. Although Tito's real authority is in fact maintained, the Yugoslavs believe that in theory the new system combines the best aspects of both separation and unity of executive and legislative powers.[29]

The new constitutional theory makes an interesting distinction between the political and administrative functions of the executive branch of government. The Executive Council and President, it is asserted, discharge only the "political side" of the executive function, leaving the administrative side to the bodies of federal administration. These include the organs dealing with economic matters and the regular federal departments. Of the latter, only the heads of the foreign affairs and the national defense secretariats are members of the Executive Council, the others being under civil service and having no "original political powers." Moreover, acts of these purely administrative organs may be appealed to the courts under a special Administrative Disputes Act.[30] In this way, the framers of the Yugoslav Constitution hope to safeguard against what they term the "bureaucratic state capitalist system of the Soviet Union," where the same organs wield both political and administrative power.

Thus the federal Government no longer has ministries devoted to running specific industrial branches, as is the case in the USSR. The functions formerly performed by these ministries have been distributed in three ways: to the workers-management set-up of the Higher Economic Associations, as far as production is concerned; to the ministries of the constituent republics and the councils of the People's Committees, as far as administration is concerned; and to councils, committees, and boards consisting of both federal and republic government officials, as far as coordination and over-all policies are concerned.[31] For example, when the Ministry of Heavy [29] Ibid. See also, Rad. D. Lukić, "The Principle of Unity of Powers in the Federal Constitutional Law," and Ivo Krbek, "The President of the Republic," New Yugoslav Law, Nos. 3–4 (July–December, 1952).

Industry was abolished, there was at the same time created[32] a Council for Machine Construction, and a General Board for Ferrous Metallurgy. The Council for Machine Construction is composed of a federal official as chairman, the director-general of the machine construction industry and the director-general of the ferrous metallurgy industry, representatives of the FPRY Ministry of Defense and the ministers of the constituent republics dealing with machine construction. The Council's task is to "direct the general management of machine construction and ferrous metallurgy . . . and to coordinate" the activities of the organs of the Peoples' Republics competent for these matters. The General Board for Machine Construction is charged with management of enterprises concerned with machine construction, while the General Board for Ferrous Metallurgy is concerned with management of ferrous metallurgy enterprises. Each is headed by a federal official, and their composition is similar to that of the Council for Machine Construction.

Similarly, the economic control functions of the republic governments have also been decentralized by creation of councils. Whereas the federal councils are comprised in part by republic government representatives, the councils at the republic level are comprised in part by representatives of non-governmental organizations, such as factory units.[33]

Giving coordination to these diverse bodies is the Economic Council, composed entirely of federal officials and integrated with the Chief Planning Administration. It is through the Economic Council's participation in industry at all levels that control and guidance are maintained by the national government. The Chief Planning Administration, on the other hand, which draws up the basic plans for the country as a whole, contains only three federal officials in addition to the heads of the planning commissions of the constituent republics. Under this arrangement, planning on the level of individual republics is reflected in the national plan, although it is strictly subordinated to the Economic Council.[34]

It is not intended here to make a thorough analysis of either the new Constitution or the new administrative arrangement but only, rather, to cite those aspects of it which the Yugoslavs claim make their state a "different and democratic kind of socialism."[35] The major features of the system, it is clear, are a new emphasis on federalism, decentralization of both government and economy, and certain elements of democracy not hitherto associated with the so-called people's democracies. The main purpose of the new set-up seems to be to create an organization which avoids what the Yugoslavs charge is the chief deviation of the Soviet Union from Marxism-Leninism, that is, state capitalism under the dictatorship of an independent bureaucracy in which working class ownership of the means of production is but a fiction. Simultaneously, it is asserted, the new constitution marks the first steps toward actual withering away of state functions.

The changes in Yugoslav agricultural policy will be treated here even more briefly. Whereas it appears that the reforms in government and the economy are intended to be of a lasting nature, the same cannot be said about the current "softer" attitude toward collectivization. This policy, doubtless like similar relaxations in some other Eastern European countries, is strictly in the nature of an agricultural NEP. The reforms, designed to correct admitted errors in collectivization policy as well as to appease peasants, are for the purpose more of meeting an emergency situation than of charting a new permanent course.

"For us, the collective farms are not a matter of dogma," Tito said in an interview. "We are not concerned about the forms—about whether they are called socialist or not. What we need is more agricultural production—more bread. We are trying to find means of getting it."[36]

But Tito, in his speech to the Sixth Party Congress emphasized a note which is repeated by all commentators on Yugoslav agriculture. "The cooperatives are still one of the most important questions for us," Tito declared. "They represent the most important element in the victory of socialism in the villages. Without the victory of the socialist sector in our villages, there can be no ultimate victory of socialism in our country."[37]

Although there are four types of cooperatives in Yugoslavia, the new policies affect chiefly the so-called Peasant Work Cooperatives, which are similar to the Soviet kolkhoz. Actually this type has accounted for only about 22 percent of the total arable land of Yugoslavia[38] and only about 20 percent of the peasants.[39] In these cooperatives, peasants give up ownership to any land, implements, and livestock they may have held. A majority of the remaining peasants in the country are affiliated with the so-called "general" type of cooperative, in which land is pooled but private ownership retained. This type of cooperative has its roots in the old zadruga. The rub has come currently in the fact that peasants in the general cooperatives have rebelled against pressure to convert them into Peasant Work Cooperatives, and many members of the latter, hustled into the new form in the days of pro-Soviet enthusiasm, now want out.

The main points of the new policy are these:

1) Peasants in the Peasant Work Cooperatives are now permitted to leave, and whole cooperatives may, if they wish, disband.

2) The Government has recognized that the kolkhoz type cooperative is suited only to fertile areas and not suited for areas of difficult terrain.

3) In place of a policy of favoring Peasant Work Cooperatives at all costs, the principle has been established that these cooperatives must be profitable in order to work.

4) For the time being, increased emphasis is being placed on building up the general cooperatives. To encourage their productivity, forced deliveries have been abandoned, and rent payments for owners of land are being paid.

5) To give incentive to members of the Peasant Work Cooperatives, money wages have been substituted for payment in kind, with a basic wage guaranteed.

6) To avoid making private ownership too attractive, a limit of ten hectares has been placed on the size of all private, individual farm holdings. Land above that figure is compulsorily sold to the Government.[40]

On paper, the new reforms, all told, certainly do give Yugoslavia a new face. Their sum total adds up to quite a deviation from Soviet practice. It still remains to be seen, however, whether or not they do in fact work out as they are supposed to, and, if they do, where this may lead in terms of democracy as it is understood in the West.

Will the new reforms work? The history of state planning so far has been that planning begets more planning; controls beget more controls. That has been the experience of the Soviet Union, for instance, where the trend has been toward more and more detailed plans and more and more centralized devices for verification.[41] It was also the experience of the United States in its war production planning operations during World War II. The Yugoslav innovations sharply reverse this trend. The state plan is now concerned only with "basic proportions" of the economy. Over-all investment requirements will be determined by the Chief Planning Administration, and "certain key investments" will be specified. Beyond this, the decision as to what investment is necessary is to be made by the industry-wide organizations and the Workers' Councils of individual enterprises, in conformity with limits set by the republic governments.[42]

These industry organizations and Workers' Councils now also set prices, except prices of basic raw materials and certain semi-finished goods. Minimum wages are defined by the over-all plan, but realization of sufficient profit to pay these wages, as well as any increase in wages, depend on production and sales.[43] The following illustration has been cited by Mr. Kidrič:

> A textile factory has set as its minimum production 80 percent of capacity, or 100,000 meters of cloth, with 50 dinars per meter calculated as labor cost. This will necessitate a selling price (at least) large enough to cover a 5,000,000 dinar wage fund, in addition to purchase of raw materials, depreciation, taxation, and investment. The financial plan assumes only this amount. Should the factory not earn it, only a part of the deficit may be made up by the state. But wages beyond the minimum can come from profits, which in turn depend on still higher selling prices as well as efficiency of production, administration and salesmanship.[44]

With the supply of both raw materials and consumers' goods as limited as it is in present-day Yugoslavia, difficult problems in supply and demand are posed as producing units compete to maximize their profits. If not worked out properly, these problems could easily upset the balance of the economy envisaged by the over-all plan. Already, for example, there have been reported instances of unemployment—which should never occur in a socialist state—in several cities and industrial areas of Yugoslavia. The unemployment was said to be due at least in part to reduction of the labor force by Workers' Councils, which feared that otherwise their factories might show a loss.[45]

The Yugoslav answer to this is that by giving to individual producing units and their workers more initiative and incentive, they will be sure to gain in efficiency and output and in the long run come out ahead. An example has been cited in the operations of the Djura Djakovic locomotive plant in Brod. Prior to the inauguration of the new system of management, the director of a wheat mill asked the director of the locomotive plant for mechanical assistance in repairing a broken axle. Before this could be done, the director of the Djura Djakovic plant had to have an authorization from the Ministry of Heavy Industry in Belgrade. The authorization came six months later, and in the interim the mill was almost completely idle. But with the system of Workers' Councils, things were different. Shortly after a Workers' Council began operation at the Djura Djakovic plant, four different enterprises in the vicinity of Brod asked for mechanical assistance, which was rendered forthwith, without the necessity for authorization from anywhere.[46]

Furthermore, it is insisted that there are adequate federal powers to keep the new open market in Yugoslavia from becoming an "anarchic market." But even as he made this assertion, Milentije Popović, the Yugoslav Finance Minister, added: "In order to regulate relationships in the market and to secure the operation of our market properly, it is necessary to envision all measures necessary. That is why we must continue vigilantly to watch also over this problem and work on it."[47] In fact, official fears of an anarchic market apparently act as a sharp brake on making full use of the economic freedom theoretically granted. The 1952 Plan, for instance, calls for four-fifths of total investment for production within the over-all plan.[48]

[45] The New York Times, May 9, 1952. The unemployment was also attributed to raw material shortages. In February, 1953, 70,000 persons were said to be unemployed. Trade Union relief and government work projects were to be undertaken. "Trade Unions Act to Solve Unemployment Problems," Yugoslav Review, Vol. II, No. 2 (February, 1953). The development of decentralized social security may also prod republic and local government units to fight against unemployment-producing decisions in the factory. See "Self Management of Social Security," Yugoslav Review, Vol. I, No. 9 (November, 1952).

Suffice it to say here that it is still too early to say how this decentralized socialism will work in practice. Starting out on a socialist economy in 1945, the Yugoslav planners went to unrealizable extremes in formulating their industrialization plans.[49] Certainly they will have to be constantly on their guard to avoid similar extremes in the matter of decentralization.

But there are other, perhaps even more serious, problems that must be hurdled before the new type of socialism envisaged in the Yugoslav reforms is a working reality. Marshal Tito himself has stated that the new system must be put into effect gradually. In a backward and underdeveloped country like Yugoslavia, it is only natural that the great majority of workers would be unfitted for management responsibilities. How rapidly the laws giving workers control of their factories will be implemented, Tito realistically said, will depend "on the pace of cultural development, meaning the extensive training of the workers so that they may be capable in every way of running factories, mines, transport, etc., successfully for the benefit of the community." Pointing out that the majority of Yugoslav workers are former peasants, Tito added: "From poor peasants who have for centuries been vegetating at the lowest possible cultural level and standard of living, they are to become conscious workers, builders of a better life for themselves and the whole socialist community. This will not be an easy or a rapid process. . . ."[50]

Yet Tito and his Government have insisted that a start be made because "in the process of management, in the unceasing process of labor and running the enterprises, all the workers will gain experience." The important thing, it is insisted, is that it has been started, that "the new law [on management by Workers' Councils] has made its appearance as one of the rare legislative acts of democratic development and of the victory of the idea of social progress."[51]

In all governments there is often a big gap between statutory provisions and hortatory statements on the one hand and political fact on the other. This is especially true in Communist Eastern Europe. The main reason, of course, is that, regardless of government changes, control and conformity is maintained by the monolithic structure of the various Communist parties. Until the Party Congress at Zagreb, in November, 1952, nothing was said in all the discussion of the new reforms in Yugoslavia about the role of the Party. The purpose of that Congress, in the words of Aleksander Ranković; Minister of the Interior, was to "harmonize the Party's work with the changes that have occurred in connection with" the new reforms.[52] The Fourth Congress of the People's Front, the former Partisan organization in whose name the Party has run Yugoslavia, was also said to have been called for the same purpose.[53]

The exact significance of the Party changes is still unclear. The name of the Communist Party of Yugoslavia was changed to the League of Communists of Yugoslavia. The People's Front became the Socialist Alliance of Working People of Yugoslavia. From the Congress' Resolution[54] and from resolutions adopted by the Fourth Congress of the People's Front,[55] it seems that the Party envisages for itself a somewhat more restricted role than formerly, but the written material on the question to date is as vague as only Communist literature can be.

The Party's course now, according to Mr. Ranković, is set "toward its becoming a political and ideological factor." Party membership, he said, "does not mean any special rights or privileges."[56] Instead of directing the affairs of state, the Party apparently is now supposed only to lead through propaganda and example, with the Socialist Alliance—to which, it is claimed, 80 percent of all Yugoslav voters belong[57]—carrying out its charges. Significantly, out of the twenty-seven members of the presidium of the Socialist Alliance, twenty-one are members of the Central Committee of the League of Communists. Marshal Tito, of course, is head of both.

The Party departed from its previous Soviet practices by permitting expulsions of any member, including Party officials, by the basic Party organizations. Review by a higher unit had been necessary. The Congress also went in for some decentralization, giving greater powers to the Party congresses of the various republics. The effect of these decisions, according to Mr. Ranković, is to "suppress dangers of bureaucracy in the Party."[58] Earlier, steps were taken to eliminate certain material privileges, such as special rations and housing, for Party members.[59] The former New York Times correspondent in Belgrade, M. S. Handler, who was often critical of the Tito regime, declared at the time: "For the first time a Communist state has abolished the line of demarcation separating the rulers from the people and has adopted as a fundamental principle a modicum of equalitarianism."[60]

Yet at the same time the Party was charged with intensifying its propaganda activity against "dangers from bourgeois, clerical and similar elements, who, masked with bourgeois democracy, have the object of renewing Fascism and capitalistic social relations. . . ."[61] Significantly, in the months immediately following the Party Congress there was an obvious increase in Communist anti-religious activity in Yugoslavia, aimed especially at the Roman Catholic Church.[62]

Despite changes in the Party and despite the greatly increased discussions about democracy in Yugoslavia,[63] Tito and his aides have made it very clear that they are opposed to democracy as we understand it in the West. Lest there be any doubts on that score, the official magazine Kommunist warned in August, 1953, that Communist discipline must be strengthened and pointed out that it would be a mistake to place bourgeois capitalist interpretations on the Yugoslav concepts of freedom and democracy. "It is not a rare

[63] For example, the columns of Review of International Affairs were opened to a debate on "Socialism and Democracy" between Rodoljub Čolaković, a member of the Central Committee of the League of Communists of Yugoslavia, and Kaj Bjork, Secretary for International Affairs of the Social Democratic Workers (Socialist) Party of Sweden. See Vol. III, Nos. 22 and 24, and Vol. IV, No. 2 (November 16 and December 16, 1952, and January 16, 1953).

occurrence," Kommunist charged, "that members of the Communist League believe they have the right to protest against decrees and other measures that have been adopted in our Socialist State in a democratic manner."[64]

Further, it is doubtful if the objective conditions for "bourgeois democracy" exist in Yugoslavia. Not only do the same factors which Tito says will make difficult worker management of industry stand as an impediment to democratic government; there is also an absence of a democratic tradition and of the tradition of popular participation in politics as far as the masses of people are concerned. If this is so, then the Yugoslav leaders fear, as Milovan Djilas told the Party Congress, that a trend toward "bourgeois democracy" in Yugoslavia would be but "a mask for turning back" to the "semi-feudal" conditions which existed before World War II.[65]

In any event, it takes more than laws and words to make a democracy. The writer recalls that during his 1950 trip to Yugoslavia an official of the Ministry of the Interior objected to his use of the term "police state." "Here," said the official, "political freedom is allowed as long as it does not jeopardize the safety of the state." And who decides what jeopardizes the safety of the state? "The police, of course," said the official. And habeas corpus, this is non-existent, isn't it? "Habeas corpus?" asked the puzzled official. "What's that?" When it was explained to him, he looked more puzzled than ever and said: "But if the police have to release somebody after arresting them, why arrest them in the first place?"

Since that time, a new, liberalized criminal code has been put into operation.[66] This has been heralded by no less an authority than Justice W. O. Douglas as containing the seeds of the principle of habeas corpus and judicial democracy.[67] Furthermore, the head of the UDB, the Yugoslav police, Minister of the Interior Ranković, has stressed to the Party the necessity for "further consolidating democratic socialist legality" and for independence of the courts. He also criticized the acts of certain UDB organs and promised they would be curbed in the future.[68]

But Mr. Ranković was careful to add this warning:

> Some think that the strengthening of the authority of the law courts, the protection of lawfulness and the spreading of socialist democracy means also appeasement in the struggle against the enemies of socialism and against all those who with their activities endanger our socialist order. . . . Such people also think that this is a decrease in the severity of the people's authority and the law courts in the struggle against such appearances. Such ideas are a great mistake. . . . On the contrary, such law courts . . . will be and must be the severest and most merciless enemies of these appearances which do harm to the socialist community and endanger its existence.[69]

Thus the Yugoslavs appear to be charting a course between the Scylla of Soviet totalitarianism and centralized controls on the one hand and the Charibdis of Western-type democracy and capitalism on the other. This is a narrow course with many shoals, and the voyage promises to be an exciting one. Certainly for students of socialism and comparative government it is one that may be studied with great interest and profit.

Dear Ed:

Please forgive the "Dear Ed," but I'm the Herb Nelson you may remember as a fellow member of what we called the world's first college broadcasting class at Washington State. Frank Mortimer and I put on allegedly humorous quarter hours each week in that class over KWSC. We were freshmen and you were a senior at the time.

Since then I've been slugging away in the advertising agency vineyard, running Ruthrauff & Ryan's San Francisco office for several years, and now since April in my own shop, as indicated above.

I often point with pride to our ephemeral acuaintance, and use you as my best name-dropping material. Also, I'm one of your best supporters, I'm sure.

Point of all this is that I heard a piece today on "This I Believe" -- a quote from and by Jay Kennedy, the financial consultant and author. Is it possible to get a copy of his remarks? I subscribe to them completely, and want to pass this philosophy on to my two sons.

Yes.

Please don't think I'm seizing any opportunity to impose on a chance acquaintance. Once, I even spent the night in Pawling, and on the golf course the next day saw you in your living room, but resisted the impulse to rush in for some plain and fancy backslapping. I really want the Kennedy piece, and will appreciate your help in getting it.

Thanks a lot. And a salute to your good works. We're all a little better off because of the boy from Beaver.

Dear President McIntosh:

I am sorry not to have replied before this to your letter of Arpil 15. I had made what I thought was a flat and final decision that this year I would undertake no additional commitments, but I cannot refuse your gracious invitation to become an honorary sponsor of the Nephrosis Foundation.

Unfortunately for me, this business of five radio shows and two television programs a week leaves me little or no time to devote to outside activities; however I shall hope there will be something I can do to help further the work of the Foundation and am pleased to have my name associated with it.

Dear Mr. Murrow:

I am writing to ask that you join with me as an honorary sponsor of the Nephrosis Foundation of New York and New Jersey, Inc.

Nephrosis is a disease which involves the kidneys and, through them affects the general health. It is not rare and it occurs chiefly among children. The exact cause of the disease is not known and today approximately half of the children who contract Nephrosis die.

The Nephrosis Foundation has recently been formed to provide funds and coordinate research and education in the cause of Nephrosis. Prior to the formation of the Foundation, individual groups of parents of Nephrotic children informally contributed to research projects on behalf of this disease. Today, such research is being conducted in some of our most outstanding medical centers: Children's Medical Center - Boston, Massachusetts; New York Hospital - Cornell Medical Center; Columbia-Presbyterian Medical Center and New York - University Bellevue Medical Center.

While we scarecely dare hope that you will be able to participate actively in the affairs of the Foundation, your association as an honorary sponsor will be of the utmost value in our attempt to broaden the work of the Nephrosis Foundation, on behalf of the community. I do hope you can encourage us with the support of your name.

Dear Mr. Murrow:

Since I have come East as a member of the Senate, I have had an opportunity to both see and hear your excellent radio and television programs. I want to tell you how much I appreciate the programs of a man who is civilized, enlightened and impartial in his attitude. It is a refreshing contrast to some of the hysterical programs which try to cater to the worst emotions in people rather than to the good impulses which lurk in all mankind. Let me thank you for your presentations.

I do not want to conclude this letter without telling you about someone whom I think would be a "natural" for one of your programs. That is my wife, Maurine Neuberger, who is a member of the Oregon State Legislature. She is a most unusual person. In fact, I have an article in the forthcoming June issue of Harper's Magazine which is a kind of personal profile of my wife. Its title will be "My Wife Put Me in the U.S. Senate".

Mrs. Neuberger is a unique individual. By training and preference she is a teacher of physical education and modern dance. In fact, when I phoned her once to tell her I had been honored at a dinner attended by Franklin Roosevelt, Senator Herbert Lehman and Mayor Robert Wagner, she asked me, long distance from Oregon, "Was Martha Graham there?"

Anyway, Mrs. Neuberger will be coming East in ten days or two weeks, when the Oregon Legislature adjourns. I think you would find her a very fitting person for one of your programs.

Let me again thank you for your radio and TV presentations and to tell you how proud I am of the fact that you come originally from our own Pacific Northwest.

May I please hear from you?

I would consider it a privilege to be of assistance either with this Bulletin, or any other material.

- M. Georges Bidault, France's Foreign Minister is working on a compromise solution of E.D.C. which may be acceptable to his Parliament. According to this German units of the E.D.C. would be set up, but the integrated Command which would tie France would not be set up for the time being.
- Marshal Juin, Central European Forces Commander of S.H.A.P.E. would be in charge of these units. For the time being these German units would work in close liaison with the American, British, French occupation units in Germany.
- Chancellor of the Exchequer, R.A. Butler of Britain is planning a journey to Washington in March to discuss with the U.S. Secretary of the Treasury the decisions of the Sydney Commonwealth Economic Conference.
- While the Russo-American talks in Washington on Atomic co-operation are welcomed, London and Washington would like to revive the U.N. Atomic Energy Commission and keep world opinion informed through this body on progress, if any. Washington feels that this is complicating the issue and prefers direct preliminary talks with the Russians. So do the Russians apparently. This is the one issue where the U.S. and Russia stand together facing others.
- The visit of King Feysal of Iraq, which was due to start in Pakistan on January 18, has been indefinitely postponed. This is a diplomatic victory for Neguib of Egypt who fears that Iraq a member of the Arab League would get involved in the planned defence talks between Pakistan and her neighbours.
- Soviet submarines have been unusually active of late around Vladivostok and the Manchurian ports of Dairen and Port Arthur. Russia's Far East submarine fleet is 42 of which 22 are operational.
- General Gruenther will shortly announce the appointment of two high-ranking officers, who are guided missiles experts to his command at S.H.A.P.E. One is going to be an American, the other a Briton.

- Russian experts are working on creating a Polish-Czech-East German steel co-operative trust with an output of 12m. tons in 1954 to be developed as a disturbing rival to the S-Pool. Already East Germans and Czechs are offering some steel products to the West at cut prices.
- Moscow preparations for March 5, first anniversary of Stalin's death, show that Malenkov intends to commemorate this event on a very modest scale. In some outer Soviet republics and satellite capitals this will be on bigger scale.
- Polish and Czech diplomats have joined in the wooing of France reminding the Quai d'Orsay that they are France's natural Allies. Both have recently increased their diplomatic personnel in Paris.
- Preoccupation of U.S. State Department officials with a new type of northern protective armour over the Middle Eastern area is due to the fact that Iraq, Iran, Kuwait and Saudi Arabia are expected to produce 200 million tons of oil a year by 1958 - two-thirds almost of the U.S. oil output.
- Bonn will shortly approach the U.S., Britain and Western European countries for restoration of all German patent rights confiscated after the war.
- The Japanese are unwilling to accept 'tutoring' by the U.S. forces of the new Japanese Home Defence forces, though they are prepared to accept a strong U.S. military mission.
- Bishop Herrera of Malaga, one of Franco's closest advisers, opened a new drive for fairer taxation, minimum wages, workers' share in business profits and social security measures. Senior leaders of the Church oppose him.
- Field-Marshal von Paulus is sending out hundreds of letters to former German military leaders pointing out that only Russia can bring about German unity and that friendship with Russia was essential for the future Germany.
- Dr. Dunnar Myrdal, Secretary of the U.N. Economic Commission for Europe hopes to organise an East-West trade conference this year as a result of his present tour of the main European centres, including Iron Curtain capitals.

Dear Ed:

Only six weeks have past since I last reminded you that we want you to come to Pitt in the fall, but several things have changed since then so I want to reaffirm the invitation. — answered May 3

Firstly, our series with Princeton will be held October 18 to 20 instead of in November. We would love to have you speak at a banquet on any one of those nights, as best fits your schedule.

Secondly, we want to express our firmness in the belief that you are the best news commentater in the business, despite the fact that Alcoa will not be your sponsor after this summer. The sponsorship makes absolutely no difference to us; we still hope you can come.

Dear Ed:

This is to remind you that we want you to come to Pittsburgh to speak at a banquet in connection with a series of public debates similar to that we held with Cornell, as explained in the enclosed program.

The series we are holding next year will probably be with Princeton on November 1 to 3. Since Wednesday is your lightest evening, perhaps November second, would be the best time.

Congratulations on the Salk show, which everybody in Pittsburgh watched with great interest. You continue to have the undiluted allegiance of every member of this faculty.

All best wishes and we do hope you can come next November.

WQED Politics Show Catches Big Audience

By FRED REMINGTON

Not since we were staying cool with Coolidge has a Republican candidate had it so good as Commissioner John M. Walker had it on Wednesday night.

As a result of last week's big wind, Oakmont's foremost rose fancier and former state senator found himself talking politics in one of television's classiest spots. No Democrats around cluttering up the place, either.

Now a big wind is no particular stranger to politics, but the unusual relationship here perhaps merits some explanation. As a result of WENS' tower being blown down that station is transmitting temporarily over the facilities of WQED on Channel 13.

So we are getting an intermixture of WENS' commercial network shows and WQED's local, community-service offerings. A new WQED feature on Wednesday nights is "Campus on Call," a forum sponsored by the Pitt Debating Society with college student participants.

It is a useful and interesting show, but its Wednesday night ratings were never a threat to Arthur Godfrey. Until last week, that is.

Commissioner Candidate

Wednesday night Commissioner Walker, one of four candidates for three County Commissioner offices and an old Pitt debater himself, was scheduled for a session of questioning on the show. It also has been the policy of the show to permit viewers to phone in with questions for the guest.

Because of the intermixture of WENS and WQED shows, "Campus on Call" was sandwiched between two network shows. It followed ABC's Wednesday night powerhouse, "Disneyland," and preceded CBS' top panel show, "I've Got a Secret." This happy adjacency gave it a whale of an audience.

So there was Johnny Walker free-wheeling in a spot a commercial sponsor would give eye teeth for.

Many of the audience got right in the spirit of phoning in questions for the willing Mr. Walker.

Clobbered Switchboard

"They really clobbered our switchboard," reported William A. Wood, the manager of WQED. "Frankly, we weren't prepared for it. We lost a lot of calls because we were undermanned."

Many callers chose to ignore the fact that Commissioner Walker's political life has been spent on county and state levels. They demanded to know whether Ike will run in 1956, and a few held Mr. Walker personally accountable for Republican opposition to the proposed $20 cut in federal income. tax.

"I wasn't figuring on all those national questions," Mr. Walker said the next day. "But one party called and asked whether the Republicans in Pennsylvania are opposed to a wage tax."

The commissioner was on the question like a barracuda.

"YES WE ARE."

Another wanted to know if it wasn't true that the Republican administration of Gov. John S. Fine tried to pass a state income tax.

O happy day for Mr. Walker, no friend of our former governor.

"Yes he did," replied Mr. Walker gleefully, "but the Republicans in the Senate defeated it."

Democrat on Phone

While this Republican jubilee was in progress there was at least one Democrat who was not idle.

Comes a phone call from Rep. Jules Filo, assemblyman from West Mifflin.

Isn't it true, asked Mr. Filo craftily, that the Republicans passed House Bill 481, the act that has come to be known as "the tax everything law?"

"Well, bless your heart, Jules," beamed Mr. Walker as the moderator read the question. "I'm glad you're tuned in. Yes, it's true the Republicans passed that bill.

"But never," he continued sorrowfully, "never did we dream that Mayor Lawrence would use it to pass a wage tax in Pittsburgh."

And about then it was time for "I've Got a Secret."

"It was a good show," Mr. Walker said the next day in happy retrospect over the 'Campus on Call" performance. "Good panel, good moderator, and a beautiful spot."

Basking in the wake of this week's "Disneyland" will be another Republican, District

The Purpose

College debating has two purposes: to train students in the techniques of argument, persuasion, and public speaking; and to motivate them to inquire into controversial public issues which are the concern of every citizen in a democracy. We hope, in addition, that those who hear these debates will be enlightened and entertained; but the primary purpose of the activity is to train those who participate.

The speakers in this series are not authorities on the topics debated, though they have read about and discussed them a great deal. Neither are they practicing attorneys, though the techniques they use and the principles they follow are very similar. Nor are they members of Congress, with power to act upon the questions debated. They are students engaged in an educational activity which we hope will provide them with techniques of dealing intelligently with public issues.

Most important, the debaters you will hear do not have the final answers to the question they are discussing. If such answers existed, the topic would not be debatable. Democracy presupposes that decision on such matters will be reached by discussion, argument, and compromise, and not solely by reference to experts. The topic being debated in this series we regard as being genuinely two-sided. The debaters will not settle it, nor should they be expected to.

This series brings together for the first time two of the leading collegiate debating associations in the United States. Cornell debaters, under the direction of John F. Wilson, emphasize home-and-home debates on a variety of topics. The debate association also conducts intramural contests in various aspects of public speaking.

Pitt Men's Debating Association, under the direction of Robert Newman, currently enrolls 40 members, and conducts five interrelated programs: (1) an intramural program, with three regular meetings a week devoted primarily to practice sessions and reports on trips; (2) an intercollegiate program, with 20 trips a year to major college tournaments. High point of this year's program was the Seventh Annual Pitt Cross-Examination Tournament, Dec. 10-11, 1954, which featured Oxford and Yale in a public debate, and 25 other colleges competing for the Crucible Steel Trophy. (3) The high school program, with the present Cornell series as the fourth and final such event in 1954-55. Others: Dartmouth, Yale, and Notre Dame, which will reach a total of 24,000 students in 30 schools. (4) The service club program, with some inter-collegiate events, as on Tuesday and Wednesday of this series, but primarily featuring intra-squad programs before 35 local groups. (5) CAMPUS ON CALL, the MDA-produced television series appearing on WQED, Channel 13, Wednesdays at 9:00 p. m. The Association is an activity of the Office of the Dean of Men, with Joseph Trattner serving as President.

We are indebted to the Foreign Policy Association and the Health and Welfare Federation of Allegheny County for making the television guests available Wednesday evening. They are in town for the Fourth Annual World Affairs Forum for Youth, sponsored by the above organizations.

PURPOSE

CAMPUS is presented by the Men's Debating Association of the University of Pittsburgh, operating under the Office of the Dean of Men. Its purpose is to present the views of college students on topics of interest to residents of Western Pennsylvania; "experts" will be on hand to provide answers where technical information is required, but the main purpose is to duplicate as nearly as possible what happens in a college bull session.

The MDA program has two purposes: (1) to train students in the techniques of argument, persuasion, and public speaking; and (2) to motivate them to inquire into current public issues. In addition to this television series, the Association carries on four integrated programs:

(1) The intramural program. Eighty meetings are scheduled during the school year, with participation open to any undergraduate. These are held Tuesdays and Thursdays for a period of two hours, and feature practice debates, reports on trips, extemporaneous speaking contests, and occasional lectures. Approximately 40 students participate.

(2) The intercollegiate program. Conducted at novice and varsity levels, this program involves 250-300 contests annually with some 90 other colleges and universities. Most of these debates occur at major tournaments such as the Georgetown, Brooklyn, Boston University, Purdue, and Arizona meets. High point of the year is the annual Pitt Cross-Examination Tournament, which this year will be held December 10-11, with Oxford and Yale as featured teams, and 30 other colleges competing for the honor of meeting them.

(3) The high school program. For many years, Pitt debaters have presented 30-minute programs before assemblies of Western Pennsylvania high schools; last year, Dickinson, West Virginia, Princeton and Notre Dame opposed Pitt before a total audience of 27,800. This year, series will be held as follows: Dartmouth, Nov. 1-4; Yale, Dec. 10; Notre Dame, Mar. 7-10; and Cornell, Mar. 29-31. These debates will be sponsored by Crucible Steel Company of America, and the Pittsburgh Post-Gazette.

(4) The service club program. To round out the speaking experience of Association members, abbreviated debates are presented before Rotary, Lions, and Kiwanis clubs, and civic and church groups, on topics of current interest. Known colloquially as the "knife and fork" circuit, these programs will this year reach 35 groups.

Director of the Association is Robert Newman; Assistant Director, Lloyd Fuge. Student officers are: Joe Trattner, President and television producer; Tom Rutter, Vice-President and television announcer; Paul Balles, Audience Manager, television secretary, and manager of the Cross-Examination Tournament; Dan Levitt, Publicity Manager; Stan Greenfield, Secretary; and Bob Sedler, Treasurer.

We hope you enjoy these discussions, and welcome your comments at 1309, Cathedral of Learning, Pittsburgh 13.

THE TELEVISION PROGRAM

Thursday, December 9, 8:30 p. m.

On WQED, Channel 13

"WHAT WILL WE FIGHT FOR?"

Out of the discussion on Communist China, which is the American intercollegiate debate topic for 1954-55, many questions arise as to the advisability of a "war of liberation." These questions come up not only in regard to China, but in regard to other Soviet-dominated territories. This discussion will explore the attitudes of present-day students not only toward these problems, but toward war in general.

Participating: THOMAS RUTTER, Vice-President of Pitt MDA, moderating; ALEX R. SEITH, former President, Yale Political Union; LEWIS K. UHLER, Vice-President, Yale Debating Association; JOSEPH TRATTNER, President, Pitt MDA; and LYNN WATSON, Pitt debater.

This is the 10th in the series of programs entitled CAMPUS produced weekly on WQED by Men's Debate. The series includes discussions of topics ranging from religion to coeducation and sports. Television producer for the Association is Joe Trattner; announcer and moderator, Tom Rutter; secretary, Paul Balles.

The Purpose

College debating has two purposes: (1) to train students in the techniques of argument, persuasion, and public speaking; and (2) to motivate them to inquire into controversial public issues which are the concern of every citizen in a democracy. We hope, in addition, that those who hear these debates will be enlightened and entertained; but the primary purpose of the activity is to train those who participate.

The speakers in this series are not authorities on the topics debated, though they have read about and discussed them a great deal. Neither are they practicing attorneys, though the techniques they use and the principles they follow are very similar. Nor are they members of Congress, with power to act upon the questions debated. They are students engaged in an educational activity which we hope will provide them with techniques of dealing intelligently with public issues.

Most important, the debaters you will hear do not have the final answers to the questions they are discussing. If such answers existed, the topics would not be debatable. Democracy presupposes that decision on such matters will be reached by discussion, argument, and compromise; and not solely by reference to experts nor by following the dictates of a "Leader." The topics being debated in this series we regard as being genuinely two-sided. The debaters will not settle them, nor should they be expected to.

This series marks the first visit to Pittsburgh of a Dartmouth debating team. Directed by Herbert James, Dartmouth teams are recognized as among the best in the Eastern United States, and hold current championships in a half-dozen major tournaments. The Dartmouth Forensic Union, of which Mr. Waddell is President, carries out an extensive program of speech events under the sponsorship of the Department of Speech.

Pitt Men's Debating Association, under the direction of Robert Newman, currently enrolls 50 members, and conducts five interrelated programs: (1) an intramural program, with four regular meetings a week devoted primarily to practice sessions and reports on trips; (2) an intercollegiate program, with 250-300 contests annually. High point of this year's program will be the Seventh Annual Pitt Cross-Examination Tournament December 10-11, with Oxford and Yale as featured teams, and 30 other colleges competing for the privilege of meeting them. (3) The high school program, with the present Dartmouth series as the first of four such events in 1954-55. Others: Yale, Notre Dame, and Cornell, which will reach a total of 24,000 students in 30 schools. (4) The service club program, with some intercollegiate events (as on Monday and Tuesday of this series) but primarily featuring intra-squad programs before 30 or 35 local groups. (5) CAMPUS, the MDA-produced Television series appearing on WQED, Channel 13, Thursdays at 8:30. The Association is an activity of the Office of the Dean of Men, with Joseph Trattner serving as President.

Dear Mr. Baldwin:

Very many thanks for your letter of January 19th telling me of the New Yorker's intent to reprint "The World On His Back." It is extremely kind of you to suggest that I send a list of people to be added to your mailing list, but I really do believe that most of my friends who would be interested already are in the habit of receiving the New Yorker.

With best regards.

Dear Mr. Murrow:

On occasion The New Yorker reprints certain of its editorial features for distribution to a promotion list consisting of roughly 10,000 advertisers, news commentators, educators, city editors - both in this country and abroad. It is a fairly carefully selected list of a group of people whom we like to call "opinion molders".

We are reprinting "The World On His Back" from our December 26th issue as our first reprint of the new year.

I am well aware of the fact that this Profile should be of great interest to a number of your friends and associates who may not appear on our list. This would be particularly true of your man friends in Europe. If you care to send us a list of people from your own files, we will be delighted to add them to our mailing list.

Incidentally, I hear from my favorite brother-in-law, Winkie Barr, that his point-four investigating tour of the far East and Africa is proving both exhausting and interesting.

In our household we still religiously follow your broadcasts on both radio and T.V. And for these, we are deeply grateful.

Very cordially,

As a Trustee of the University of Chicago I am anxious to be of use to them in a large fund raising program, currently under way. A Chicago prospect of whom they have heard is Mr. H. Leslie Atlass, a Vice President of your company in Chicago.

Mr. Atlass has shown some interest in the University but in a very modest way. He is reputed to be very well off and his brother Ralph likewise is on the prospect list. If you would be agreeable to telephoning me some day and giving me any information regarding Leslie Atlass or his brother Ralph which I could properly use in this good cause I should be very grateful. Furthermore the prospect of a telephone chat with you is very attractive to me.

Dear Ed:

My partner, Brooks Peters, is just back from Ethiopia and is returning there again the end of next week to handle the press, television and radio coverage of the 25th anniversary of Haile Selassie's coronation.

This should be one of the more colorful events of the year and it occurred to me that you might want to talk to him before he shoves off. The celebration takes place in Addis Ababa the first week in November and Brooks will not return to this country until after it is over.

Please give me a ring in case you would be interested in a chat with him before he departs.

I hope your new schedule allows you to relax a little.

Dear Roscoe:

A few intimate friends call me Osgood as a form of affectionate derision and it's in terms of the adjective that I risk the wrath of the air god.

This is just a note to thank you for the Christmas present - The New Yorker profile. I thought they did a fine job on a fine fellow and if your purpose was to use this as a method of telling your friends why you no longer have time to lunch with them, you succeeded.

I have only one quarrel with the profile. Though it succeeded in protecting you from looking like the news analyst in Marquand's "Melville Goodwin, U. S. A." it didn't quite get the essence of Murrow. This is probably ungettable even by Murrow but it has always seemed to me that that intense feeling with which you have handled the events of the past fourteen years has finally moulded a magnificent backboard on which to bounce current happenings.

The profile talked about your voice as if it was something detached from the content of what you say, which is a little like trying to divorce Sarah Bernhardt from her acting.

This is a very poor way of saying that you have cared so much for so long about things for which we all should have cared so much for so long that you can even make the partisans listen to ideas with which they disagree because they somehow sense that you have long since earned the right to express them and to command their attention.

Warm personal regards,

Think of the heritage for our country if these research men at our great universities could have afforded more than the usual one or two children! How many fine young ministers in their early careers dare have more than a few and still feed them!

I hear Dean Sayre's great pleas for the refugee children. Is he saying he would deny life to several of his own fine heritage in preference to these?

The attitude of "the right" of these people to parenthood is another subject that is absurd.

For every man that died on the battlefront some American girl is denied husband and children. Add to this the great number my countrywomen have lost to overseas marriages of our men.

These women must go childless because of the same war that made

I was horrified at the cold callousness of Golda Meir for the Arabs driven from their homes. Hitler and Stalin had nothing on her. Only the names and places are different. I am not Anti-Jewish; I merely think the overflow could have gone elsewhere. For my own life I would prefer a quick extermination to being driven off my little piece of land.

I have always been a close follower of your programs and nothing gets preference. I have not been a letter writer, but this time felt like voicing the thoughts that have evolved during nearly three score and ten years of trying to make my gift of life an asset to my country instead of a liability.

New York 22, New York

Dear Mr. Murrow:

Thank you for your prompt and courteous reply to my letter about the possibility of your spending a little time with the Foreign Radio/TV Specialists the Department of State has brought to this country. } attached

Since our program while in New York from November 5-November 9 will probably more flexible than yours, I am wondering if it would be more convenient for you to set the time and place, if you find your schedule will permit, when they could get together with you. Perhaps sometime Monday, November 7?

I realize how very busy you are, and I think it is generous of you to try to fit this in. I am sure it will mean much to them when they go back to their own countries if such a meeting can be arranged.

Sincerely,

Elizabeth Nixon

Dear Miss Nixon:

Many thanks for your letter of September 5th calling my attention to the group of foreign radio and television specialists brought to this country by the State Department to study American methods in the media.

I note that the group will be in New York from November 5th to November 9th and shall be happy to spend some time with them if my schedule permits. Perhaps you will be good enough to let me know what the program is to be during that period.

Unfortunately I cannot think of any way to use the group on my own programs, but I am passing along your letter to Mr. Irving Gitlin, Director of Public Affairs for CBS, who may have some ideas.

Sincerely yours,

Dear Mr. Murrow:

I have been looking at Eugene Castle's new book "Billions, Blunders and Baloney."

It occurred to me this might make a subject for one of your programs.

Get Castle to discuss his book and observations for half the program and have someone from the US Information Agency and/or Voice of America on the other half of the program to explain the objects of the services criticised by Mr. Castle.

It should have public interest since it's public money that Mr. Castle is discussing.

Very truly yours,

Quotations from "Billions, Blunders and Baloney," by Eugene W. Castle:

ARMIES OF PROPAGANDISTS

For the first time in history, American propagandists and cultural promoters abroad have become almost as numerous as our accredited diplomatic representatives and their staffs. Today our psychological warriors occupy almost as much office space and housing facilities as do our diplomats. Often these United States Information Agency press agents, whose aim it is to "mold men's minds," impede and disrupt important moves to carry out established diplomatic procedures.

Since the end of the shooting phase of World War II, our Government's overseas establishment and payroll have grown beyond reason and usefulness. Visualize, if you can, the entire population of Columbus, Ohio; or Newark, New Jersey; or Memphis, Tennessee, or Oakland, California, and you will have a rough idea of the number of civilians employed by the U.S. Government throughout the world.

Foreigners generally are amazed at the lavish expenditures of the FOA, the USIA, and other grossly over-staffed United States agencies abroad. They cannot understand how the American people, who pay the bills, can continue to tolerate these ostentatious spendings--a performance in plain view of the tens of thousands of American tourists who annually travel in Europe.

WE ARE LOSING GROUND

If the United States were benefiting in goodwill from this ostentation and spending, we might overlook the lapses in good taste and tact. Unfortunately, the reverse is the case. As the information outlays have burgeoned, the curve of American popularity has gone steadily downward in both France and Italy. We are like a man on a revolving wheel: the more money we spend, the faster the wheel propels us backwards.

The real humiliation of the situation is that while we pour out billions, and become more disliked, Soviet Russia spends comparatively little, directly, in both France and Italy, and yet its influence proliferates. The explanation of course is that Russia does not send armies of conspicuous Russian propagandists to these countries; her propaganda is conducted for her by native French and Italian Communists. Russia has no need to maintain princely edifices for its propagandists, because she has highly trained native Reds, in her Communist parties, who skillfully plead Russia's case as Frenchmen and Italians--and not as outsiders.

It is important to recall that in 1948 we spent $21 million for foreign propaganda. Today we are spending 5 times that sum and we have fewer foreign friends and supporters than we had then. Today we are still trying to accomplish through torrents of ill-conceived and badly timed propaganda what our nation's leaders and chief spokesmen have failed to accomplish for us through diplomatic efforts.

MONEY WASTED ON FRIENDS

This is not the full story.

The maladministration and waste of both personnel and money in our Government's huge and far-flung propaganda activities are not confined to France and Italy: they are duplicated throughout Europe, the Near East, South America and parts of the Orient still free from Red China. Too few Americans realize that the USIA is today spending millions and its chief spokesmen are still seeking to obtain more millions to waste in countries where we should not be spending one dollar for propaganda--countries like Turkey, Greece, Belgium, the Netherlands, the Scandinavian countries, Great Britain and Spain, where the Communist menace is so remote that it simply does not justify our attempts to "mold men's minds." The majority of the peoples of these countries understand the menace of Communism and want no part of it.

- - - - - - - -

We can comprehend the size of the information bear which we have by the tail when we note that in fiscal 1954 a total of 10,171 persons were on the USIA payroll in Washington, D.C., and in its 77 overseas missions. The average annual salary which they drew, according to the 1954 budget report, aggregated $5,735.

PRIVATE AGENCIES DO A BETTER JOB

A comparison of USIA's ten thousand payrollers with the streamlined personnel of an efficient private news-gathering organization of comparable scope will show how ridiculously overstaffed USIA is.

Consider the New York Times. It publishes a huge daily edition, and a Sunday edition which, with its supplements, runs to several hundred pages per copy. Its news facilities reach into every part of the world.

And yet this immense publishing enterprise gets out its issues with a total editorial and news staff of approximately 325 persons.

The Chicago Tribune, boasting the largest circulation of any standard-size daily newspaper published in the United States, employs a staff of about 282 people for its local, neighborhood, domestic and foreign coverage of the news.

Twenty-five leading American newspapers in all sections of the United States have a combined total of only 5,000 employees in their editorial and news departments. The Associated Press, with correspondents throughout the world to serve its member newspapers in the United States and its clients abroad, maintains its very extensive day and night wire services with a total of 3,000 employees.

USIA's heavy payrolls unquestionably indicate an extremely unhealthy administrative situation.

When the USIA propaganda director and his large staff of assistant directors and other officials appear before the appropriations committees of the Congress in their annual appeals for increased funds, they argue that, without the facilities of the USIA, our country would be completely isolated insofar as telling the world about America is concerned. The USIA managers would have us believe that our great Nation is informationally blacked out and that they provide the only "open window to the world" for the dissemination of our ideas, ideals and objectives. In saying this they ignore the immense contribution to overseas understanding of America which is made by private publishing organizations operating without government subsidy.

OUR MAGAZINES ARE ALREADY SELLING AMERICA

For instance, superbly written statements of the American point of view are printed and distributed throughout the world by our own Reader's Digest, but with this generally unknown and important difference--the Reader's Digest international editions are published abroad in twelve languages, in thirty different editions; and the monthly circulation of this fine foreign promotion for Americans totals 7,165,000 copies that are distributed in 58 countries to reach a monthly readership of thirty million people!

And the Reader's Digest overseas circulation--tremendous as it is--is only part of the English and foreign language American publications which regularly enjoy large foreign readership. These include:

Life, foreign and South American editions	550,000	semi-monthly
Saturday Evening Post	425,000	weekly
Time, newsmagazine	375,000	weekly
Newsweek, newsmagazine (American edition)	60,000	weekly
U.S. News and World Report (American edition)	25,000	weekly
Collier's	225,000	semi-monthly
Look Magazine	181,000	semi-monthly

MOTION PICTURE SERVICE THE WORST WASTER

If Uncle Sam ever should make up his mind to apply the meat-axe to some of the encrusted barnacles which cling to the United States Information Agency, he would not have to search far for a target.

A logical starting point would be the International Motion Picture Service, which has plunged Uncle Sam headlong into the movie business, producing propaganda films for use abroad.

Of all the follies put over on an unsuspecting public by our self-styled psychological warriors, this flicker nonsense is perhaps the most costly and indefensible.

Few Hollywood producers of stature would ever take any personal responsibility for the kind of film nonsense we have been shipping abroad for years in the vain hope that by this means we can combat Soviet-inspired propaganda.

To date, about $100,000,000 has been poured down the government's movie-making drainpipe. Uncle Sam has purchased some 6,700 sound projectors, each costing about $400, and a fleet of 355 mobile film units, costing over $6,000 each. Total investment in equipment alone exceeds $5,000,000.

PROPAGANDA MOVIES ARE POISON

Anyone with even scant understanding of the minds of our Allies realizes that any motion picture which even faintly hints of propaganda will never be accepted by them. Neither will it contribute to the downfall of Communism. Europeans particularly have been exposed to propaganda since the days of Hitler and Mussolini. They have developed an immunity to it that probably will never wear off.

This basic political reality is recognized by Eric Johnston, president of the Motion Picture Association of America. Returning from Europe several years ago, Mr. Johnston advised Hollywood:

> "If we deliberately made propaganda films, our industry would not only go bust, but would be doing the worst possible service for America."

Who sees these films?

"It is mostly the people who do not go to motion picture theaters that will see these pictures," Dr. Johnson told the House Committee.

"How will they see them?" asked Representative Frederic R. Coudert (N.Y., Rep.)

"We have little trucks, some 300 of them, that will take these pictures out into villages, way back in the country, where many of the people cannot read, and where they do not even have newspapers."

Most of these people, it would be safe to say, are more in need of something to eat than a movie showing how the Empire State Building's windows are washed.

G.O.P. MUFFS ITS CHANCE

When the Republican Administration took office, Uncle Sam had an excellent opportunity to get rid of the USIA's useless and often harmful motion picture service.

The new Administration had promised unsparing economy in Federal expenditures. What better place was there to institute drastic budget slashes than in the admittedly inept USIA and its film activities?

Two possible courses of action confronted the new government heads. Either the motion picture service could have been eliminated entirely with no weakening at all of the over-all information program. Or else, it could have been drastically reduced. Now, the Service was already equipped with a sufficient stock of educational films which could have supplied the normal requirements of educational exhibitors abroad for a period of ten years or longer, without any new production, if the second course had been followed.

Unfortunately, neither course was taken. Instead the new Administration advocated an astounding increase in the budget for the motion picture service! The USIA had sold a bill of goods to the White House!

The true American story is a saga of heart-stirring content. Properly told, as the entertainment film producers have consistently done it, the American story has gripped the imagination of the world. But the USIA is not telling that story.

Instead it is engaging in all sorts of questionable border-line undertakings designed to trick foreign audiences into seeing and hearing outright American propaganda. In disregard of all movie industry experience, it is making, and intends to continue making, costly foreign propaganda films in foreign countries in the hope that they can be shown on a "sneak" basis in foreign commercial movie houses. In such countries as Italy it is attempting to subsidize foreign newsreels. It squanders tens of thousands of dollars to photograph and record in a dozen languages such goodwill tours as that of Vice President Nixon in the Orient (including a now totally inappropriate Indo-China sequence) and the visit of Dr. Milton S. Eisenhower to South America, despite the fact that all news interest in these tours has passed long before they can be exhibited.

STASSEN PUTS FOREIGNERS AHEAD OF AMERICANS

Not often do politicians admit that handouts to foreigners must come ahead of security for Americans.

But Harold E. Stassen made such an admission in a public statement on December 6, 1952, just after he had been selected by President-elect Eisenhower to head the Mutual Security Administration--soon rechristened the Foreign Operations Administration. Mr. Stassen has always enjoyed hearing himself talk and on this occasion he really pulled out all stops on American foreign policy.

His aim, said the Mutual Security Director-to-be, would be to bring about "peace and good living conditions for all the world's people." And, Stassen added, "We cannot, nor must we ever trim our aid to needy free nations just for the sake of cutting our own budget."

From the start, the Foreign Operations Director has faithfully followed the dangerous doctrine of perpetual American deficits, as long as a single "needy free nation" asks our dole.

In Washington, which so often resembles an Alice-in-Wonderland stagesetting, the prize exhibit is probably the presently named Foreign Operations Administration, nee Mutual Security Administration.

In FOA, waste and give-aways really reach the stratosphere. Where USIA picks the pockets of Americans in millions, FOA is up in the airy heights of the billions. For 1955, its budget was set at $2,781,499,816 in new cash and $2,462,075,979 in carry-over funds, totaling $5,243,575,795 for foreign aid for the fiscal year.

But this will only be a part of the actual cost of FOA to the Nation. An accumulated backlog of grants, voted to FOA by previous Congresses, and which the FOA big brass have not had time to spend, approximates $10,000,000,000 -- and $2,000,000,000 of this is unallocated!

The new money is appropriated before the old money is spent. All this folding money will be at the disposal of Harold E. Stassen and his billion-minded lieutenants.

AID PROGRAM HAS OUTLINED ITS TASK

FOA is a government spending agency which continues to exist, prodigally, long after its announced program has been completed. It symbolizes the self-perpetuating persistence of waste. President Eisenhower's urgent plea of June 24, 1954, that the 1955 FOA appropriation be passed by Congress without reduction doomed any hope of a realistic trimming of this fruitless program.

The American voters elected General Eisenhower to the Presidency in 1952 on his implicit pledge to wipe out waste wherever, under the lax hand of Truman, it had entrenched itself in our Government. Particularly, they expected the quick liquidation of MSA, predecessor of FOA. Here, it was generally agreed, was one spot where billions could be lopped off without hurt to American well-being or without weakening of our national security.

Instead of getting the American people out of MSA, President Eisenhower promptly placed his stamp of approval upon it.

In the 83rd Congress he asked that it be prolonged for at least four years, in the face of Congress' demand that it be strictly limited to a one year operating period. The only notable changes which followed were a change in the name, from MSA to FOA, and a change in the directorship, from the ineffectual W. Averell Harriman to the egregious Harold E. Stassen. Opportunity to get the United States out of the foreign subsidy quagmire was tossed away.

BILLIONS DON'T BUY SECURITY

How do the partisans of the FOA program justify this huge bite which they are taking out of the nation's budget?

An arguable defense of FOA spendings would be that these billions have purchased security for the United States; that they have won for us dependable Allies who will stand beside us against the Soviet Russia-Red-China axis when we need them. It would be heartening to believe this, but the facts do not bear it out.

Americans, with Podsapian optimism, reassure themselves that they have Allies. Actually, the Free World, with unimportant exceptions, is a neutralist world, and our World War II partners -- Britain, France, Republican Italy -- are cynically unwilling to make the hard and fast commitments to the United States that would close the door to possible future bargaining with a winning Communist other side.

When we take the longer view, the aid which we have poured out under ECA, MSA and FOA to such a politically unstable nation as France, for instance, may actually be a contribution to American weakness, rather than to strength.

France, with its outspoken anti-American extreme Left and extreme Right, and with its irresolute center, could easily pass into the hands of a government which is willing to make a deal with Russia, were the United States in serious danger. In that event, all our immense givings to France and to NATO could turn out to have been a contribution to the enemy. They would be scooped up by an advancing and occupying Soviet Army.

STOCKPILES THAT MIGHT BE USED AGAINST US

A picture of the quantity of these military stores which we have shipped to France and the other NATO countries was given by President Eisenhower when he reported that in the four years ending December 31, 1953, we gave these countries:

99,444 electronic and signal equipment items;
30,792 tanks and combat vehicles;
176,343 motor transport vehicles;
30,037 artillery pieces;
35,372,000 rounds of artillery ammunition;
601 naval vessels;
5,340 aircraft.

In sending these vast stores abroad, we have weakened American home preparedness, without any certainty that the material will not be used against us in our own hour of peril.

Similarly, the money and material which we have transferred in the last six years to such unpredictable nations as Yugoslavia, Italy, Egypt, Iran, India, Indonesia, etc. have been the sheerest gamble.

THE PAYROLLERS PROTECT THEIR JOBS

An impelling factor in the steady expansion of this misbegotten Federal what-is-it is the concentrated determination of the FOA bureaucracy to remain firmly glued to Uncle Sam's payroll. In the FOA job-holders Washington has a determined and resourceful lobby which has a vested interest in the year-by-year prolongation of the ruinous aid program.

Most of these men and women never had it so good before.

Their salaries with the various FOA agencies are far in excess of what most of them ever earned in private stations, or can ever hope to earn again. In addition, as they travel about the world, in first-class plane or other accommodations, swelling their salaries with generous per diems, they have an inflated sense of power as they hand out American benefactions to cringing and obsequious foreigners.

Although FOA does not publish salary breakdowns with the revealing detail of USIA, some typical instances will clarify the point. The Paris set-up is revealing. Here, on the verge of the consolidation of agencies in the FOA, MSA maintained a staff of 395 Americans, served by a larger number of locals. Of these, 21 were on the payroll for $12,800 a year, not including perquisites; 63 received $11,300 a year; 101 were down for $9,130 to $9,950 a year.

On top of these salaries the foreign service employee receives up to $3,000 a year for rental allowance for his housing. There have been some economies here and there during the last 18 months, but the basic situation remains virtually the same.

As might be supposed, FOA and its predecessors have been prolific publicity seekers. In the 1954 budget occurred an item of $7,600,000 for information. Wherever MSA operated it maintained its own publicity facilities, side by side with those of the USIA.

HOW PROGRAMS GET ENACTED IN WASHINGTON

The plain reasons for the continuation, year after year, of topheavy appropriations for such completely unjustifiable government ventures, despite the financial burden they impose and even in the face of campaign promises to the contrary, may be summarized as follows:

The few Congressmen who make a brave initial, or at least vocal, show against wasting huge sums are quickly brought into line by what is politely termed "White House appeal," or, in other words, pressure from the President or his White House advisers, or both. The pressure may be directed through floor leaders, or by the more flattering White House luncheon. The balky legislator is reminded of patronage for his State or District, withheld or denied if he shows too much obstinacy. He is also sternly reminded of what party he belongs to and how necessary is conformity. "In these critical times," is usually added as a clincher.

Secondly, there is the trading on the head of the pork barrel, a custom that has increased, from a modest start, with the growth of the country. Again the recalcitrant Congressman, who honestly believes that the appropriation is way out of line, or padded, or even unnecessary, is reminded of one of his pet projects. There is that little item on House Bill No. XYZ_{23}: to spend $10 million on Little Skunk Creek Dam--an engineering project that will be of small benefit to anyone except the reluctant Congressman running for reelection. So, on the next roll call, the well-intentioned legislator switches his vote. The popular name for this is logrolling.

The third reason, and most dishonest of all, is the common practice by agency heads of last-minute spending of unused and unobligated funds left over from the previous year's appropriations. When these unused funds are concealed and the whole amount asked for is granted under pleas of need, or dire necessities, the particular department of the Government is in deep clover. But sometimes, as occurred in July, 1954, the unspent funds are brought to light and the honest economists among the legislators call for a showdown.

Background of Eugene W. Castle, author of "Billions, Blunders and Baloney"

Eugene W. Castle began as a general reporter and newsreel cameraman in San Francisco, where he was born. He created and was the first editor of the Pacific Coast editions of the "Mutual Weekly" and "Fox News". In 1923 he founded what was to become the world's largest non-theatrical film operation -- Castle Films.

For more than twenty years the byline- "Edited by Eugene W. Castle" was seen by tens of millions of people in homes, schools and institutions throughout the world.

A Marine Corps Sergeant in World War I, he created and directed the enlistment promotion for the U.S. Marines Central Recruiting District at Kansas City, Mo. The district climbed from among the lowest to the highest in the Nation in number of recruits obtained for the Marines. He originated such long-remembered World War I slogans as "Pershing Needs More Marines" and "Remember Chateau Thierry--Join the U.S. Marines".

The late George Creel, President Wilson's able Director of Information in World War I once said: "Castle has an uncanny ability to evaluate news and to make today's headlines work for him. He knows when to say it. When to shut up. When to turn on the heat. When to turn it off. His enthusiasm for the job in hand is amazing."

Throughout World War II Mr. Castle's company was the sole distributor to non-theater audiences for the United States Government of all of the defense training films as well as the hundreds of pictures produced by the Army, Navy, Air Force and the Red Cross.

Under his personal direction the distribution and showing of films to train defense workers in thousands of war plants throughout our nation was successfully planned and achieved-- the biggest job of its kind ever done.

In addition he produced and personally edited the "News Parade" covering in motion pictures - every important episode of World War II and Pearl Harbor to Victory Over Germany and Japan.

Memo to Editors and Correspondents:

Attached are quotations from a forthcoming book, "Billions, Blunders and Baloney," which we consider one of the most news-provoking we've ever published. Author of the book, which will be distributed to the Nation's booksellers about January 31st, is Eugene W. Castle, founder and former president of Castle Films, Inc. Mr. Castle, at his own expense, travelled 75,000 miles around the globe to conduct personal investigations into why we are losing the confidence and the friendship of the world by squandering billions and by blundering propaganda inanities abroad. This is the first time this fantastic story is appearing in book form.

Editors and correspondents are free to make any use they desire of the attached material, providing, of course, they observe the 6 P.M. January 31st, 1955 release date.

For those editors and correspondents desiring a complimentary pre-publication copy of "Billions, Blunders and Baloney," a postcard is also attached.

The New York Times - September 6, 1955 - By Russell Baker (9/5/55)

Denver: Then, the Vice President gave this interpretation of what he suggested had been Senator Joseph R. McCarthy's fatal error.

There was, he said a political adage to the effect that "you must not strike a king unless you kill him."

"Politically," he said, "you could say you must not strike a leader unless you destroy him. I think that our political history shows that when you have a great issue and an individual decides to take on the top man, if he wins out on the issue he gains in popularity, but when you make a frontal assault on somebody bigger, you'd better be sure you win. If you lose, you're through."

Dear Mr. Norris:

Your letter of June third to Mr. Edward R. Murrow has been passed along to this office, and it would appear that your program suggestion, SEE IT AGAIN, would conflict in many ways with the program YOU ARE THERE, which we have on television and which has been on for over a year. It happens we have presented "The Capture of John Dillinger" on that series as well as many other important historic events.

YOU ARE THERE originates live here in New York at 6:30 to 7:00 p.m. on Sunday, Eastern Daylight Time, and is carried on Station KRLD (Dallas-Fort Worth), Channel 4, at 4:30 p.m. on Sunday; on KEYL (San Antonio), Channel 5; on KGUL (Galveston-Houston), Channel 11; and on WKFT (Wichita Falls), Channel 6, at the same time on Sunday.

If you have not had occasion to view the program, we hope you will try to do so, and we feel confident you will find it of particular interest.

Thank you for your letter of June 3rd concerning your idea for a new television program called "See It Again." Dear Mr. Murrow:

I'm taking the long chance this will reach you personally, to present an idea for TV show, SEE IT AGAIN. As a long-time listener of HEAR IT NOW and even more enthusiastic fan of SEE IT NOW, I believe this proposal will appeal to you as a vehicle of unlimited possibilities.

SEE IT AGAIN would offer a selection of the historical highlights of the past quarter-century, or earlier events where newsreel films were made and are available now. I'm sure your commentary today on these momentous events, in the light of intervening incidents, would make a wonderful program. SEE IT AGAIN could present the widest range of subjects: politics, disaster, international crises, war and peace, mournings and celebrations.

There would be a great educational service, it seems to me, in recounting the scenes of the Stock Market Crash, Dillinger Capture and Subsequent Escape and Slaying, Edward VIII Abdication, Spanish Civil War, Chamberlain at Munich, VE and VJ Day Celebrations, GOP and Democratic National Conventions. Such highlights could be tied to an anniversary date or a current event of similar circumstances. Your style of reflection on such history would be a lesson to both old and new generations, and still quite entertaining.

I am not acquainted, you see, with the proper procedure in presenting an idea for television. Whatever it may or may not be worth, I will appreciate hearing from you.

Dear Mr. Murrow;

At the request of my brother, Morris, enclosed please find a tape of the only address of Mrs. Mamie Bradley made in New York at the recent protest rally sponsored by the Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters.

I have it. sh

Morris thought you'd be interested in her manner as well as what she had to say. If you can use this in any way at all I would greatly appreciate it, as WLIB was the only station to cover and air the rally.

Thank you for your cooperation.

Sincerely,

Dear Mr. Novak:

Many thanks for your nice letter of February 17th.

I do indeed remember our two all too brief encounters during the war, and hope very much that we shall some day have an opportunity to meet again.

I want you to know that the program which Dick Hottelet produced with the aid of your organization turned out very well indeed. No doubt you will be seeing the film of this, and hope you will agree that it gave a very comprehensive idea of the work that is being done.

I do not know when next I shall have an opportunity to visit Munich, but when I do I shall certainly hope to see you.

With all good wishes,

Sincerely,

Mr. J. Novak

Munich, February 17, 1955.

Dear Mr.Murrow,

I should like to take the opportunity of the visit to our station of Mr.Richard Hottelet - to remind you of our two encounters during the last war.

In 1944 we met in Ambassador Raczynski's house in London, and you told me then about your experiences in Warsaw in 1939. You did not know, of course, that this conversation took place on the eve of my departure to Poland. On the next day I was sent to Southern Italy and then parachuted to Poland as an emmissary of the Polish Government in London. I came back to England early in 1945, as the first eye-witness of the Warsaw Rising, and on the day of my return I broadcast a 10-minute interview for the C.B.S. from your London studio. You were receiving this interview at the other end, in New York, and we conversed for a while. I was very much impressed by the fact that you remembered our first encounter so well.

I am very pleased to tell you that owing to the singular workings of Providence, I can continue today - as an exile - to do the same kind of work which I was doing during the war. As Chief of the Polish Desk of RFE I can devote my efforts to maintaining contact between the Free World and Poland.

I hope that if you come to Europe some day, you will be able to visit our station and I shall then have a pleasant opportunity of meeting you again.

Sincerely yours,

J. Nowak

Ed Morgan left for Europe the day after he quit CBS. He will be coming back Monday the 28th and leaving on the 30th to take on his new assignment for ABC in Washington.

Could you join a few of us for a drink and lunch December 29th at the Weylin Hotel, 40 East 54th Street at 12:30? I am asking some of his old associates at CBS, his new associates at ABC, and some of the radio editors.

Would you have your office call and let me know if you can come?

My dear Ed:

I guess you saw some of the publicity on the Facts Forum statement by Congressman Hays. It's too bad it had to break on the Saturday of Labor Day week-end. The Congressman thought his deadline for the Congressional Record would be September 10, but at the last minute it was advanced to September 3.

I hope you get a chance to look it over. If it's not the best study in terms of literary style and psychology, it's the first and most analytical study made of Facts Forum.

FACTS ABOUT FACTS FORUM

Report by Representative Wayne L. Hays
18th District Ohio
Ranking Minority Member Special Committee to Investigate
Tax Exempt Foundations

September 3, 1954

Facts about Facts Forum

Facts Forum claims to present both sides of important issues. To some degree, it does present two sides, rather than both sides. Although there is a good deal of factual material in its presentations, the two points of view it presents are not necessarily the only points of view possible, nor even the principal points of view held by most people.

The program is in no sense impartial. Although two sides are presented, there is no doubt which side Facts Forum itself is on. That is the key to its partisan character.

The technique used is that of presenting an important question and two contrasting viewpoints, and then, almost in every case, identifying one viewpoint on this single question with the entire philosophy of government to which Facts Forum adheres. The program is also characterized by half truths, distortions, generalizations, and exaggerations. One program (#53, dealing with the Bricker Amendment) even misquoted the Constitution, stating that Article VI reads, "All treaties...shall be the supreme law of the land...anything in the Constitution to the contrary notwithstanding." The actual language of the Constitution simply asserts the supremacy of the Federal power over the State and reads, "This Constitution and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof and all treaties made, or which shall be made, under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land, and the judges in every State shall be bound thereby, anything in the Consitution or laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding."

A single program may not have too much effect on a casual listener, but it is the cumulative effect that takes its toll -- the steady hammering away of Facts Forum's own isolationist and reactionary views, the repetitious identification of liberalism and internationalism with subversion and Communism.

How does this program differ from a truly impartial program, such as American Forum of the Air? Listening to American Forum week after week will not give you even a hint of how the producer and moderator feel about the subjects under discussion. Listening to American Forum regularly will not produce a consistent line of political thought. On the other hand, listeners know all too clearly where Facts Forum stands and what its political thinking is.

This is indicated by the flood of mail coming to newspapers and Congress from listeners in support of the side which Facts Forum supports, such as the Bricker Amendment and Senator McCarthy.

In addition to its technique in regular programs, Facts Forum frankly discloses its own views in the infrequent programs where it presents only one side. Such a program was "The American Bill of Rights and Thanksgiving" (#104). Here is Facts Forum speaking for itself:

> "Today, all over the globe, people are promoting a philosophy of government which they like to call liberal and progressive, but which, in its essence, is a return to the dark ages of human civilization...It is a philosophy which holds that government has the power and the responsibility to do something for the people; that the force of government must be used to control all the lives of all the people all the time, in order to insure them economic security. It is a philosophy which has been promoting in this century throughout the world, an implacable drive toward a monolithic uniformity; a leveling off of mankind to a dull level of mediocrity; a drift toward a great one-world of animated puppets where everyone will have his equal share of a little bit of nothing...In the 20th Century, this fearless American philosophy of freedom is despised, not only by the totalitarian governments, but also by the so-called free governments throughout the world...Countless numbers of American today apparently, by what they say and do, are not only willing but eager to sell their birthright of freedom for the mess of pottage which goes under the label of government subsidies and economic assistance to the public..."

Some of its views seeped through in another broadcast, an otherwise neutral Christmas program last year ("Hope of the World"), where the following political ideas were expressed in the context of an appeal for religious faith:

"I do not look to government for rights, privileges or assistance, knowing that government can give me nothing that government has not first taken away from me..."

Here, in capsule form, are the views which Facts Forum tries to inculcate in its listeners through its technique of presenting "both sides." Here are the keys to Facts Forum's political thinking: the linking of "liberal" with dark and dictatorial rule; the idea that government assistance of any kind brings the people under its complete control and kills their spirit; the attack on the "one world" ideal of the United Nations; the denunciation of our allies as "so-called free governments" equal to the totalitarians.

There is a close identity between Facts Forum's message and the personal opinions of H.L. Hunt, who, in the words of Facts Forum moderator Dan Smoot, "was among the original founders of Facts Forum and is its heaviest financial contributor." (#112).

In a pamphlet written in 1950 (quoted in an interview in the Washington Post, February 16, 1954, Pg. 1), Hunt said, "...the public is entitled to the facts on both sides of all issues and cannot be pacified with the...kind of news which left wing workers are willing to let them have." Hunt's ideas of how to present "the facts on both sides" without including "left-wing" views is apparently carefully followed in the Facts Forum format.

According to the same interview, Hunt does not like the words "liberal" and "progressive" which he identifies with "vicious, radical, spendthrift elements" and with "alleged people's parties ruled by ruthless and murderous dictators who say they are also liberals." Next to Communists, he is quoted as saying that the word that seems to arouse him most is "liberal."

These and others of Hunt's basic political ideas seem to be faithfully reflected in Facts Forum.

The following conclusions have been drawn from a careful study of Facts Forum programs of the past year:

1. The major technique of Facts Forum is to identify a legitimate viewpoint with all of Facts Forum's political philosophy.

This permits it to use factual material in presenting the side to which it is opposed, thereby leading to the claim that it is completely fair and unbiased. But that may be compared to the situation involved when a lynch mob rushes its victim to the nearest tree, loops a noose around his neck, gives him two minutes to speak in his own defense, and then strings him up. Under those conditions, a casual bystander is not apt to be in the mood to believe him.

It should also be noted that many of the facts presented on the anti-Facts Forum side are carefully selected. Much of this material is actually neutral in character, deliberately chosen for its lack of persuasive capacity. Some of the "arguments" presented on the other side actually damage the case in behalf of which they are ostensibly introduced.

Facts Forum's theories are communicated via a "shotgun marriage" between a valid point of view and its entire position. It deliberately ignores the fact that other positions are possible. A person holding one view similar to that of the program finds himself driven toward swallowing a whole philosophy.

The result is that, although the question may be reasonable and the pro and con is sometimes valid, the arguments presented produce extreme positions. There is no room for moderates on either side. (This is apparently in line with H.L. Hunt's advocacy of "both sides" without what he calls the "left-wing" side.)

If Facts Forum has its way, Americans will be driven to choose between its own extreme views and the other extreme, leaving no moderates and no middle way.

The world of Facts Forum becomes a black and white world where wishy-washy liberals, and some Democrats and Republicans, at best naive and wooly-headed and at worst conscious traitors, are contrasted with red-blooded Americans upholding the principles of the Constitution to save America from Communism, and in the process becoming advocates of isolationism, McCarthyism, and against the United Nations, anti-foreign aid, anti-liberal, anti-labor, anti-large segments of both great parties.

Examples:

In #98, the affirmative side holds that an adequate national defense can be secured together with tax reductions and a balanced budget. The negative says an adequate defense is impossible without higher taxes. This is legitimate, but the prejudice is disclosed when the affirmative is linked with an advocacy of isolationism and Herbert Hoover's theory of hemisphere defense, implying that one is not possible without the other. Thereby, no possibility is conceded of believing that adequate defense is possible with lower taxes but without isolationism and hemisphere defense, nor the belief that adequate defense may be secured without increasing taxes by cutting fat from the defense budget, yet having no truck with isolationism.

In #101, the affirmative says the U.S. should remain in the U.N. if Red China is admitted. The negative says no, but it also becomes a general argument against the U.N. itself. This ignores the middle position of opposing Red China's entry in the U.N. and still supporting the U.N.

In #103, the affirmative holds that the Administration is anti-labor because of its failure to carry through the proposed Taft-Hartley amendments. The negative says it is not anti-labor for that reason, but it also contains strong arguments against unions and union domination of government in general. This leaves no room for the view that Taft-Hartley may be right, but unions are legitimate.

In #105, the affirmative says that the Democrats won a great victory in the 1953 elections, referring to the Wisconsin and New Jersey Congressional votes and the New Jersey Gubernatorial race. The negative denies it, but also denounces "New Deal Republicans" for apeing the Democratic foreign policy, being soft on Communism and attacking McCarthy. It leaves out the moderate Republicanism which opposes the Democrats and yet is not isolationist and is against McCarthy.

In #106, the affirmative wants the U.S. to depend on the U.N. to get Russia and China to release American prisoners in Korea and demand an accounting for prisoner atrocities. The negative says no, but the argument becomes pro and anti U.N. There are many who may disapprove of the U.N.'s handling of the Korean prisoner issue, but may yet be unwilling to have support for the U.N. itself depend on such an explosive and emotional issue.

In #110, approval of the Eisenhower foreign policy is opposed to disapproval, but disapproval is linked with isolationism. What of opposing Eisenhower's foreign policy, but for completely different reasons than isolationism?

In #115, the affirmative favors picketing as part of strikes, while the negative does not. But the negative also opposes unions in general. This eliminates the possibility of wanting to limit picketing, but still favoring unions.

In #116, the affirmative wants the U.S. to continue to support the International Labor Organization, while the negative says no, but it also includes arguments against the U.N. and for the Bricker Amendment. This ignores opposition to I.L.O., but at the same time still favoring the U.N. and opposing the Bricker amendment.

In 123, approval of foreign aid is opposed to disapproval, but disapproval becomes part of a general argument for isolationism. This would cut out the middle position of disapproving foreign aid to various degrees and yet not being isolationist.

In #126, one side favors Eisenhower's housing program, while the other argues that housing and other government aids are "socialistic" and "communistic". This would have us believe that those who favor government aid in housing and other fields, whether they are for or against Eisenhower's policy specifically, are dupes of the Communists.

3. The anti-Facts Forum side is often exaggerated, distorted, or oversold, or presented in such fashion as to raise doubts.

Examples:

In #98, on national defense, and taxes, the argument that we cannot provide adequate defense and still reduce taxes is oversold.

References are made to "...these costly efforts...the fate of the free world depends on active, all-out cooperation - on unlimited effort...no sacrifice is too big, no expenditure too large, no effort too great...we must be ready to accept these burdens...no matter what the cost may be...lofty spirit of generosity and sacrifice..."

Such a presentation could well frighten a person who has hitherto believed that making some sacrifices is necessary, but who would reconsider his position if "sacrifices and expenditures" had to be "unlimited" and "all-out" and other such unnecessary superlatives.

Again in #98, the listener hears a tongue-in-cheek presentation on the anti-Facts Forum side; "At this critical moment in history, it is worse than dangerous nonsense to be agitating for tax reductions and balanced budgets." When it is put this way, one may well question the value of a position which considers it "dangerous nonsense" to be advocating such pleasant prospects as tax reduction and budget balancing.

In #117, the anti-isolationist side says: "The announced motive of isolationism - politely called neutrality - is to prevent America from becoming involved in any future foreign wars." It goes on to answer this argument rather weakly, but isolationism doesn't look so bad when defined as the prospect of not getting into wars. The implication is left that internationalism has the motive of getting us into wars. This is presented as supposedly an argument against isolationism.

In the same section, our system of alliances is oversold. We hear: "More than 1500 million people in the world...are...willing to stand and die with us against our common enemy." The headlines in the daily paper would shake anyone's belief in this extreme and naive view. A true presentation of the internationalist position would admit differences between us and our allies.

In #106, another tongue-in-cheek view is presented: "The United Nations is the only agency which can operate effectively in the present chaos of world affairs and eventually emerge with a permanent peace, because within the framework of the United Nations, all nations can meet and intelligently resolve their difficulties." In the same script: "...the United Nations is working toward permanent peace in Asia..."

True enough, but put this way, it is highly unrealistic. A true pro-U.N. view would say the U.N. is the best way to get peace, but not the only way; that permanent peace is a fine ideal, but the U.N. would be satisfied with some temporary peace, too; that sometimes "all" nations do not always act "intelligently" to solve their problems. In other words, by not admitting imperfections in the U.N., doubts can be raised.

In the same script, the pro-U.N. side, for no reason whatsoever, contains a factual recital of six cases of horrible atrocities against Americans in Korea, and urges, tongue-in-cheek, that this should not "destroy our faith" in the U.N. It has the opposite effect of arousing anger against the U.N.

4. A major characteristic of the program is the deliberate and constant repetition of language discrediting liberals in general and liberal Democrats and Republicans, and lumping them with socialists, communists and totalitarians (in keeping with H. L. Hunt's views, coincidentally).

Here are a few examples among many:

#99: "Adlai Stevenson, Dean Acheson and their friends in the Socialist wing of the Democratic Party..."

#100: "The Roosevelt-Truman New-Fair Deal...has all the characteristics of the totalitarian movements..."

#102: "...20 years of New Deal Socialism...It will matter little whether we call the final result progressive capitalism, social democracy, economic planning, New Dealism, or just plain Communism."

#103: "In the late 1930's...we were caught in a strong tidal drift toward the philosophy of a socialist labor government..."

#105: "...'me-too' tactics of liberal Republicans - promising to do everything the New Deal had done only better." "...if their only choice at the polls is between New Deal Republicans and New Deal Democrats, voting is meaningless."

In #107: "During the past eight years...fundamental decisions in American policy have been made by traitors or by men under the influence of traitors whose allegiance lay in Moscow..."

#111: "During the New and Fair Deals, the socialist revolution made enormous advances in America..."

5. The anti-Facts Forum side is generally presented less strongly.

Examples:

In #100, the truth is told but not enough of it. We hear: "Government business corporations, although operating as efficiently and economically as possible, are dedicated primarily not to making a profit, but to serving the people."

This is true. But a sincere partisan of that position would have mentioned that some government corporations nevertheless have made profits and turned them back into the Treasury - like FDIC, FHA, and HOLC. Without this, there is the implication that government corporations always lose money.

The same program says, rightly enough, that government-owned businesses pay no taxes. But since there is a great deal of discussion of TVA on the program, mention might have been made of one of TVA's strongest arguments that also applies to other government agencies -- because of TVA, private corporations do more business than they would otherwise do, make more profits, and thereby pay higher taxes.

In #103, pro and con on Taft-Hartley, ex-Secretary of Labor Durkin's case for the Taft-Hartley amendments is presented, but about half of the pro-labor time is wasted on a recital of the contents of the disputed 19 amendments. This is boring to listen to, and means nothing to listeners uninformed on the technicalities of one of the most complicated laws on the books.

It is not balanced when on the pro-labor side, you hear such statements as: "The definition of the word 'supervisor' in the original act should be limited," and "The holding of a representation election should be delayed for a period of four months after the commencement of a strike," while on the other side, you hear such colorful and emotion-packed phrases as "...irresponsible power in the hands of monopolistic labor bosses...government was in the hands of those who had allied themselves with the labor bosses...President Eisenhower's labor advisers appear dedicated to the old New Deal philosophy that the political support of powerful union leaders must be bought at any cost..."

6. The program often makes vital issues of subjects which are not really current at all, but which provide the opportunity of presenting arguments that have been generally discredited, or else gives another chance of attacking an issue Facts Forum is very much interested in.

Examples:

#115 deals with union picketing in strikes. Surely this is not much of an issue at the present time. The documentation for the script proves this, since every single reference is taken from technical books and economic periodicals, and not one from a newspaper or speech, as in other scripts. The idea, apparently, is to question a principle accepted to a large degree and to take another whack at unions.

#116 deals with the International Labor Organization, again not an issue of vital importance to the news of the day. Yet it gives the program an opportunity to again attack "totalitarian liberals" and "socialism" in the U.N. and to reflect on unions, too.

7. The program fosters the technique of the "smear".

Example:

In #88: "one of the most powerful Communist fronts is the Methodist Federation for Social Action...This Communist Front's Credo - rejecting the profit motive as an economic base for society - is closely similar to a resolution passed by the World Council of Churches in Amsterdam in 1947, rejecting the ideologies of both Communism and Capitalism, and also very similar to a statement along the same line issued in late 1950 by His Holiness Pope Pius XII."

The reaction of one of the top Government officials to Facts Forum's supposed "impartiality" is presented in this item written by the Washington staff of the New York Herald Tribune (August 15), in a regular Sunday column devoted to "inside Washington" items:

> "Unlike most members of the Cabinet, Secretary Dulles had refused to appear on television shows sponsored by 'Facts Forum,' the program supported by H.L. Hunt, Texas oilman.
> " 'Facts Forum' is said to be non-partisan and non-political, which normally would satisfy Mr. Dulles' determination not to participate in political affairs while running the State Department. However, he is not satisfied the program is either non-partisan or non-political."

An excellent example of why Mr. Dulles should feel this way is provided by the program of July 3 last, discussing the Jenner-McCarran resolution to break diplomatic relations with Communist nations. The following quotes should be studied carefully, because they typify how Facts Forum can claim to be impartial, and yet be guilty of the grossest partiality:

> "Same day, May 13, 1954, while Republican Senator Jenner was standing on the floor of the Senate introducing his Resolution to break off diplomatic relations with the Soviets and their captive satellites, Republican Secretary of State John Foster Dulles was at Geneva, Switzerland in formal conference with the Soviets and one of their captive satellites. The fascinating corruscations of life is the kaleidoscope of history.

"It may or may not have embarrassed Republican Secretary of State Dulles to have Republican Senator Jenner introduce such a resolution. Be that as it may, Senators Jenner and McCarran posed for the American people a question of immense and far-reaching importance, should America break off diplomatic relations with all Communist countries.

"Facts Forum believes that a question of such great significance to the American people should be answered by the American people. Nowhere is an informed public opinion more critically needed than in the area of Soviet-American relations. Here is a problem that both underlies and overrides every other national problem we have. If we could find a correct and positive answer to the question of what to do about American-Soviet relations, we would thereby make an enormous contribution to the peace, security and well-being of our nation. Here then is an excellent answer to those millions of sincere Americans who frequently and, it must be confessed, honestly say to themselves 'I know things are in bad shape, but what can I do? I'm just one little individual with no influence or authority, not too much information, not sure of my own convictions and with rather poor ability to express the ideas and communicate the information I have. If the greatest people in our land are confused and divided about the terrible problems of our times, what on earth can I do about it?'"

Notice how subtly these words have been phrased. Nowhere can you put your finger on the words which say specifically that Facts Forum questions Mr. Dulles' Geneva conference with the Soviets, and supports the Jenner move to break relations. Yet that is the impression which is inescapably drawn.

Remember, too, that these words are not read, so that they can be studied at leisure. They are listened to. They are heard fleetingly. What other conclusion can a listener reach when these successive ideas are flung at his eardrums:

"Secretary...Dulles...in formal conference with the Soviets..."

"It may or may not have embarrassed...Dulles..."

"Senators Jenner and McCarran posed...a question of immense and far-reaching importance, should America break off relations with Communist countries..."

"If we could find a correct and positive answer to the question of what to do about American-Soviet relations..."

"Here then is an excellent answer..."

Who is to be blamed for thinking that Jenner's resolution to break relations is an excellent answer to American-Soviet relations, and Secretary Dulles is wrong to confer with America's enemies?

This is the technique of the "poison tongue" which insidiously pours venom into the unsuspecting listener's ear as Claudius poured poison into the ear of Hamlet's father as he slept.

No wonder Mr. Dulles refuses to credit Facts Forum's claim of impartiality, as the Tribune reports.

It is time the American people and the authorities also recognized the spuriousness of that claim.

Italy's Labor Leaders Winning Fight

By SYD STOGEL
Rome Correspondent AFL News-Reporter

Rome.

A FIERCE behind-the-scenes battle to keep reactionaries and neo-Fascists from taking over the government in the name of anti-Communism appears to have been won by Italian free labor leaders, liberals and progressives who have been supporting Mario Scelba's cabinet.

Ever since the disappointing national elections of June 7, 1953, when the political center forces of the country lost votes to the Communists and the reactionaries on the right, free labor leaders have been trying to convince the country's strongest political party, the Christian Democrats, that only by adopting a courageous program of social and economic reform could Communism be crushed in this country. This left-of-center political theme was personified in the Catholic party by Amintore Fanfani, whose cabinet fell after 12 days in January, and by the CISL head, Giulio Pastore.

In February, when tough, two-fisted Mario Scelba succeeded in forming a socially-minded government in alliance with the Liberal and Social Democrat parties, it looked as if free labor and progressives had won their battle to whip the Red menace by embarking on a vigorous program of reform.

The Scelba Cabinet, with Social Democrats Giuseppe Saragat as vice premier and Giuseppe Romita as labor minister, began with an out-and-out campaign to fight Communism by solving Italy's gravest social problems, such as poverty, lack of housing and unemployment.

But at the end of March the rightist clique in the Christian Democrat Party took on new strength. Because of municipal election at Castellamare in Southern Italy.

For more than half a century, with the exception of the two decades during which Fascism was in power, the Red flag has flown over the municipal tower at Castellammare. Communist rule of the town was firmly entrenched, especially after the last war, thanks to the fact that the Communist and fellow-traveling Socialist parties won every election held in Castellammare. This year, the local Christian Democrat Party was determined to beat the Reds at all costs, even if it meant making a political accord with the Monarchists and the neo-Fascists—which is exactly what was done.

The results of the election disclosed that for the first time in free elections held since 1902 the leftists had failed to win control of the city administration. The Christian Democrat-rightist coalition beat the Communist by less than 500 votes, but this was hailed as a great anti-Communist victory and gave new strength to the Christian Democrat Party's anti-labor conservative faction in its drive to form an alliance with the Monarchists and neo-Fascists on a national scale.

Labor and liberal groups in the Catholic party fought hard to kill any swerve to the right. Any tie-up with reaction, they said, would immediately wipe out the ambitious social and economic reform program which is Italy's only hope to permanently exterminate the Communist threat. Guatemala Labor Fighting Commies

By RUBEN D. VILLATORO
President, National Union of Free Workers of Guatemala

NOT UNTIL Jacobo Arbenz Guzman succeeded Juan Jose Arevalo as president of Guatemala did the Communists begin to make important headway toward control of the labor movement in Guatemala.

Last year over 4,000 unemployed workers organized a defense committee which urged the Government to study their situation and adopt relief measures. Communist elements attempted from the very beginning to infiltrate this defense committee. Among other things, they demanded that all the complaints to be submitted to President Arbenz go through their hands because they claimed this was the only way to get satisfaction. After the leaders of the defense committee decided to reject Communist sponsorship, they suddenly found the doors to public offices closed to them.

Later the judicial police, a branch of the federal police of Guatemala, started harassing the leaders of this defense committee and attempted to deport the 4,000 unemployed to distant agricultural regions under the pretext that land was available for cultivation, in spite of the fact that none of the unemployed were agricultural workers. Finally, the Communists accused the committee of being led by antipatriotic elements, with the result that all the leaders were arrested, the headquarters of the committee were destroyed, and the organization itself was forced out of existence.

Subsequently a group of Catholic leaders organized a Central Committee of Anti-Communist Workers. The headquarters, located at 4 Ave. North 18, were assaulted several times and "mysteriously" stripped of furniture and office equipment. This Central Committee of Anti-Communist Workers is at present unable to function publicly.

THE Railway Workers, members of SAMF, nominated as candidate for the post of general secretary of their organization a veteran trade union leader, Arturo Morales Cubas, who had successfully negotiated the first labor agreement in Guatemala. In spite of being a member of the party of the Guatemalan Revolution, he has maintained a great deal of independence and had never submitted to Communist dictation.

The whole governmental apparatus, inspired by the Communists, was immediately mobilized to defeat Morales. The Railway Consumers Cooperative, of which he was the manager, was "mysteriously" destroyed by a fire which caused a loss of $200,000. A group of Communist elements, especially trained in street fighting, was detailed to disrupt all the meetings that Morales was scheduled to address.

Nevertheless, the overwhelming majority of the Railway Workers and Employers voted for Morales, but the ballot boxes were taken by the judicial police to their barracks for "safe keeping." They were all tampered with, with the result that the Communist-supported ticket was declared the winner.

Last year two representatives of the Confederation of Labor of Cuba visited Guatemala with the purpose of inviting an observer to the ICFTU convention in Stockholm. Detachments of police continually guarded the hotel where the Cubans were lodged, took down the names and addresses of all those who visited them and later, after the Cubans had gone home, all of the visitors were called to police headquarters and submitted to long and painful questioning. The Guatemalan observer who attended the Stockholm convention was arrested by the police upon his return home and was set free only after he signed a statement denouncing the ICFTU and its convention.

THE National Union of Free Workers of Guatemala, which was organized last year, had its headquarters at 7a. Avenida Norte No. 49. Based on the principle of free, independent trade unionism, it opposed government domination and interference from political parties. It advocated a type of constructive trade unionism that was in open contrast with the destructive policy employed by the Communists. We began to organize unions of factory workers as well as agricultural laborers. From the capital city of Guatemala our influence began to spread all over the country.

In the month of January of this year, the Communists renewed their offensive against the UNTL by inviting us to take part in the second national convention of their CGTG. We refused because we knew that the convention would be dominated by the Communists from the very beginning.

Such a defiance aroused the Communists to a pitch of fury. On the morning of Jan. 25, 1954, a band of Communists, armed with machine guns, assaulted our headquarters, destroyed the furniture, burned the literature we had received from the ORIT and the AFL, stole what money they found in our safe, and arrested all the leaders who were present, including this writer.

We were tortured in the most barbarous fashion to make us confess that we were plotting with the international free trade union movement against the government of Guatemala. The reaction caused by our arrest was so strong that the government decided to settle our case by ordering deportation. As a result, this writer was sent to Mexico while Ramiro Aguilar, Enrique Coronado and Miguel Angel Quiroa were deported to Honduras.

Reds Ship Arms

The Communist Poland shipment of arms to Guatemala was regarded by U. S. State Department officials as a possible threat to the security of the Americas under the terms of the Treaty of Rio de Janeiro. The matter was referred to Latin American officials.

Dear Morris:

You mentioned to me in our last conversation that you would like to have a list of prominent individuals sending greetings to the Liberal Party on the occasion of its Tenth Anniversary Dinner in connection with getting Murrow's greetings.

Here is a group and it is only a part of what we have received: Senators Lehman, Paul Douglas, Kefauver, Murray (we expect the same from Humphrey and Morse), and former Congresswoman Helen Gahagan Douglas, Mayor Clark of Philadelphia, (we also expect to receive greetings from Mayor Wagner), Professor James Shotwell, former Senator Frank Graham, Averell Harriman, National Co-Chairman of ADA - Arthur M. Schlesinger, Jr., President George Shuster of Hunter, Nathan Strauss.

Also George Meany, (we expect one from Walter Reuther who sent us one last year) James Carey - Secretary-Treasurer of the CIO, A. J. Hayes - President of the IAM.

Also Congressman, Franklin D. Roosevelt, Jr., Javits, Emanuel Celler, Rudolph Halley, Stanley Isaacs, Newbold Morris.

Also Elmer Davis, Barry Gray, Michael Straight, Bill Mauldin, Rev. Donald Harrington, Roger Baldwin, Charles Abrams, Helen Hall, George Hallett, Sidney Hook.

And it goes without saying from all of our state officers including individuals like Niebuhr, Counts, Childs as well as Berle, Dubinsky, Rose also Dr. Israel Goldstein, Professor William H. Kilpatrick. Also a certain person named Morris Novik.

In other words Murrow will find himself in very good company, one of the best cross sections of American liberal opinion.

We are anxious to get to print as soon as possible the editorial section of the Liberal Digest so that we would appreciate getting Murrow's o.k. For obvious reasons we do not want to mention a name unless it is 100% definite. In all the other cases we have asked that the enclosed card be signed. You can use your own judgment as to whether you want it to take that form.

N.B.C. TURNS DOWN FACTS FORUM

Rejection Revealed in Letter Exchange Between Cultural Freedom Group and General Sarnoff

The National Broadcasting Company has turned down the request of H.L. Hunt, Texas oil operator, for the placement of Facts Forum on that network. This was revealed today by the American Committee for Cultural Freedom, which released an exchange of letters on this subject between Norman Thomas, chairman of the A.C.C.F.'s administrative committee, and General Sarnoff, chairman of the board of the Radio Corporation of America.

On April 23rd the press announced that Mr. Hunt, whose Facts Forums organization has five programs on radio and television, had asked N.B.C. to donate time for a new series of programs.

That same day, Mr. Thomas, acting for the cultural freedom group, sent a letter to General Sarnoff. It said, in part, "It is the belief of this committee and of others concerned with fair presentation of important issues that networks which donate time to someone who pays production costs or which sell time to an individual to stage a controversial program are violating proper principles of fair play and repudiating their responsibility for a balanced program. Nothing is simpler that for a man to put up a pretense of controversy by picking the opponents and making sure that one side is always the weaker. It is, I think, a serious violation of proper procedure that Mr. Hunt and his subordinates are already doing the equivalent of this on such a program as Reporters' Roundup on the Mutual radio network and on other stations.

"I do not believe that N.B.C. contemplates any such evasion of responsibility for proper balance and fair play," continued the Thomas letter. "I should, however, like a formal statement of your position which might be of great benefit in clarifying the whole American approach to fair discussion over the air."

On April 27th General Sarnoff replied, "The N.B.C. has consistently maintained the policy of retaining direct supervision and responsibility for the production of all programs of news, news analysis and commentary broadcasts over its facilities. There is no present intention to abandon that policy.

"I agree with you," continued the Sarnoff letter, "that broadcasters have a responsibility for proper programming balance and fair play and we hope that you agree that N.B.C. has faithfully discharged this responsibility. Such outstanding programs as 'The American Forum on the Air,' 'Meet the Press,' 'Youth Wants to Know,' and 'The Heart of the News,' which N.B.C. has broadcast over the years are, I think, fair illustrations of the efforts of N.B.C. in this direction."

After further discussions between Norman Thomas and General Sarnoff, the American Committee for Cultural Freedom today announced that "the position taken by General Sarnoff and N.B.C. seems to us proper and we commend it to all radio and television stations which want to encourage, as we do, fair and free discussion of controversial issues."

The American Committee for Cultural Freedom is an organization of 300 anti-totalitarian writers, artists, scientists and scholars. Its chairman is Professor Robert Gorham Davis, head of the English Department at Smith College.

Pause

Federal District Court at Chicago is expected to rule Thursday, Feb. 4, on the motion of railroad management seeking to prevent railroad unions from bargaining for a health and welfare plan and free passes. The Presidential Emergency Board has ruled that union arguments on these two key issues will be heard despite carrier attempts to gag the negotiations. After two weeks of hearings the Board has recessed until Feb. 15.

Taxes

Sen. Hubert Humphrey (D, Minn.) and Rep. George M. Rhodes (D, Pa.) introduced bills last week to increase the personal Federal income tax exemption from $600 to $800.

Increase

Service department repairmen at the Boston branch of the Royal Typewriter Co. have won an increase of $8.50 per week, A. F. Silvers, business representative for I.A.M. District 38, reports. Their weekly rate, now $81, will go up to $82 on June 1.

Health

A survey just made by the Health Information Foundation shows that eight million families—16 per cent of all the families in the U. S.—went into debt last year as a result of serious illnesses. For more about America's health problem, see editorial on page 8.

Metalworkers Coming to Washington

Unions of 15 Countries Hunting New Strategy To Block Reds in Italy

FIFTY LEADERS of the International Metalworkers Federation, representing 7,000,000 workers in 15 Western democracies, will meet in Washington this month to devise new ways to combat alarming gains being made by Communist labor organizations in Italy, Rudy Faupl, I.A.M. International Representative, disclosed this week.

Faupl

At the same time, he reported, The I.M.F. Central Committee will attempt to develop a program to bring aid and assistance to the free trade unions of France.

The critical situation in Italy and the plight of working people of France are major subjects scheduled to come before the I.M.F. Central Committee and its Economic Commission when they meet in Washington beginning Feb. 27, Faupl told THE MACHINIST.

Five years ago the I.M.F. held its first meeting on American soil convening in the Council Room of the Machinists Building in Washington. At that time, the I.A.M. was the only American affiliate of the I.M.F.. Since then, however, both the CIO Auto Workers and the Steel Workers have also affiliated. All three unions will be hosts for the meeting.

I.A.M. President Al Hayes and Faupl will represent the Machinists Union at the week-long sessions. Both are members of the I.M.F. Central Committee.

In addition to considering recommendations on French and Italian Communist problems the delegates plan to review the administration of American aid programs to those two nations and other European countries.

Faupl said the delegates want to find out why European workers have not received more of the benefits from the American foreign aid programs.

Also to be discussed are full employment, tariff and employee welfare problems.

The Central Committee is scheduled to work out a program for the I.M.F.'s next convention, to be held in August in Switzerland.

Mr. Hayes will be one of the speakers at a dinner to be given for the delegates. AFL President George Meany, CIO President Walter Reuther and David McDonald, president of the Steelworkers, also have been invited to speak.

Attending the meetings will be union officers from: Austria, Australia, Belgium, Canada, Denmark, Finland, France, Great Britain, Italy, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Norway, Sweden, Switzerland, the U. S. and West Germany.

Reliable Observers Feel Sure Italy Won't Vote Communist Regime Into Power

By SYD STOGEL
Rome Correspondent AFL News-Reporter

ROME.—Italy is not going Communist. Although the Red movement is powerful and dangerous, competent observers here say it will be almost a miracle if the Italians should become the first free people to vote a Communist regime into power.

First of all, the Reds have reached the apex of their influence and it is considered doubtful they can ever duplicate the success they enjoyed in the last election. Thanks to an extremely crafty and most powerful election campaign hitherto unmatched in intensity, in which social reforms were highlighted and Communism completely eliminated from their program, the Reds were able to induce 9½ million people to vote for them last June. Most of these votes, however, were cast for urgently-needed social and economic reforms and not for a Communist dictatorship.

The real issue of the last election was definitely not Communism but was the so-called "post-war dictatorship" of the Christian Democrat Party which, under Alcide de Gasperi, guided the nation through eight years of stable government since the war. The Catholic Party "dictatorship" issue was a Communist-created propaganda theme which all opposition parties quickly adopted to gang up against the moderate Christian Democrat group.

As the object of a bitter and concentrated attack by both the left and the right, it is no wonder that the Christian Democrats lost ground last June. But even so, the Catholic Party today is still the largest political group in the country and the only one capable of stopping the Communists.

At this point it is interesting to note that the Christian Democrats and their allies were able to win almost 62 percent of the total vote in the 1948 election, when Communism was the main issue. The Reds, on the other hand, could muster only 31 percent of the vote, even though they ran under false colors, their ballots being emblazoned with portraits of the national hero, Giuseppe Garibaldi.

ITALIANS consider it strange that Americans should be so alarmed over the fact that the Reds received 35 percent of the vote last June. The U. S., they say, never before indicated so much concern over Italian Communist strength, even in 1946, when the Reds held important government posts and were the strongest single political group in the country. In the 1946 Constituent Assembly election, it will be recalled, the Reds got 41.4 percent of the total vote. In the same election the Christian Democrats polled 35.2 percent of the vote. Last June they increased their percentage to 40.08 percent.

There is, of course, considerable cause for concern when, in a Catholic stronghold like Italy, one-third of the voting population casts its lot with Communism. Obviously, something is radically wrong and unless immediate corrective steps are taken, Italian democracy may finally succumb to the totalitarian pressure and tumble into the Soviet camp.

Seasoned political observers in Rome are in complete agreement with the veteran labor leader, Giulio Pastore, that "the ultimate success of the anti-Communist campaign in Italy depends on a bold policy of social reform." As long as this country suffers from chronic unemployment, low living standards and widespread misery it will be impossible to eliminate the Red menace.

Reforms are needed and needed vitally. Housing, for example, has been one of Italy's most urgent needs since the war, in which 6 million dwellings were destroyed. A Parliamentary Committee recently disclosed that 22 percent of the population live in caves, huts, shacks or similar improper housing. Can these people be blamed for believing Communist demagogy?

Land reform, too, is an urgent need. The Christian Democratic land reclamation measures are being executed much too slowly and must be speeded up. It is significant that last June's election demonstrated the Communists were unable to make any gains in those areas where land reform projects were seriously undertaken.

WHILE a vigorous social reform will do much to win back the millions who have been fooled by leftist propaganda, by now it is clear that the government must also take firm steps to fight Communist political agitation and economic sabotage, especially in the labor movement. Experts here are in agreement as to why the right made such large gains in the last election at the expense of the Christian Democrats. Millions of anti-Red voters hoped the rightist parties would do what the Christian Democrats have failed to do—to eradicate the grave Communist menace.

The rise in Red strength in Italy is, of course, a bitter pill for Americans to swallow. Obviously, the $3½ billion of aid granted to Italy since the war has not achieved one of its major aims, that of throttling Communism here. The Russians, on the other hand, seem to have been more successful with the money they have poured into Italy. The millions Moscow has spent here have all gone directly to the Italian Communist Party, which appears to have made good use of the money.

Although the Red - dominated CGIL is still the largest labor group in the country, during the past two years the Communists have scored gains on all sectors except in the labor movement. In the trade union field, actually, the Communists have steadily lost ground. Washington should take note of this fact in planning foreign policy.

Ike Seeks Authority To Plan, Hold Formosa Defense Line; Task Force Leaves Manila

U. S. Admiral Rejoins 7th Fleet

By The Associated Press

Taipeh, Formosa, Jan. 23 (Sunday).—Departure of a task force of three United States aircraft carriers with destroyers from Manila and the sudden sailing of the United States Seventh Fleet flagship from Hong Kong added fuel today to the fires of speculation on Formosan strategy.

But it was apparent here that Nationalist opinion is stiffening against any idea of quitting the bomb-battered Tachens and other outpost islands without a fight.

First official comment from the admittedly disturbed Philippines also favored defense of the outposts against Red Chinese invaders.

Evacuation Plan Reported

Recent reports that U. S. warships might have to help evacuate Chiang's troops from some outpost islands, such as the 20,000 in the Tachens, served to focus interest on the warship movements.

Three 33,000-ton carriers—Essex, Yorktown, and Kearsarge—headed north from the Philippines Friday. At Pearl Harbor, a high Navy official said at least 12 destroyers presumably accompanied them.

The official, Rear Admiral Herbert Hopwood, chief of staff for the commander in chief, Pacific, insisted that the movement of the task force was a "normal thing," a routine training exercise.

Vice-Admiral Alfred M. Pride, whose Seventh Fleet is committed to defend Formosa and the Pescadores, sailed unexpectedly from Hong Kong Saturday on his flagship, the cruiser Helena, presumably for the Formosa Strait.

Was on Recreation Cruise

The Helena was on a recreational cruise with other U. S. warships and had been scheduled to remain there until Tuesday. The admiral's flagship departed abruptly—and alone.

Nationalist officials said Saturday that plans were afoot to remove noncombatants from the Tachens, menaced further by Red conquest of Yikiangshan only eight miles to the north. Some sources said the evacuation had already started, but this could not be confirmed officially.

It seemed in Taipeh that the United States would have to exercise a great deal of influence if it secured Chiang's agreement to any withdrawal of his troops from that area 200 miles north of Formosa. Chiang's military advisers were reported ready to press against any such withdrawal.

U. S. Advisers Left Island

It was disclosed that a U. S. observer team of the Military Assistance Advisory Group in Formosa left the Tachens in an Ships of the Seventh Fleet patrolled, broken line, the Formosa Strait as Nationalist bombers from Formosa bases attacked Red Chinese invaders of Yikiangshan and hit Communist shipping around the Tachens and Toumen islands off China Coast.

Special Message Set Tomorrow

From Wire Dispatches

Washington, Jan. 22.—President Eisenhower will ask Congress in an extraordinary message Monday to support his plans for drawing a defense line in the Formosa area and holding it against Communist aggression.

The White House announced the move today but gave no details. Press Secretary James C. Hagerty said the message will "clarify the purposes and application of United States policy in relation to the security of Formosa and ask for the support thereof by the Congress."

House Republican leader Martin of Massachusetts said in advance of the formal announcement that he understood Eisenhower would ask authority to define and hold a line of United States defenses in the Far East.

'Wants A United Front'

Martin said he felt Eisenhower already has all the powers he needs, "but he wants the support of Congress so the world will know that in the defense of that area, America stands united."

Both Martin and Senate Republican leader Knowland of California, who also discussed the message with Eisenhower, said they assured him of strong Congressional support. Speaker Rayburn (D., Tex.) indicated that the House would act almost immediately. He advised all members to be present "not later than Tuesday."

It was considered significant that Knowland, who has been pushing for a stronger policy in the Far East than the Administration deems advisable, swung into line behind the Eisenhower move.

Knowland Camp Is Impressed

Knowland and others of his school of thought were evidently impressed that the Government was moving to serve notice on all the world that, come what may, it is determined to keep Formosa, the Pescadores, and areas vital to their defense out of the hands of the Communists.

However, implicit in the situation is another aspect which holds no great appeal to all-out backers of the Chinese Nationalist cause. This is that the Administration is apparently seeking power to regroup the defense forces in the Formosa area and in the process, to abandon some islands off the Red China Coast if that is deemed necessary; thus perhaps making it more difficult for the Nationalists to raid the Red-held mainland.

May Surrender Tachens

This could mean, for example, partial or complete evacuation of the Tachen Islands if military developments dictate. However, Administration officials contend that any regrouping that took place would strengthen the de-

Our Freedom Must Live, Ed Murrow Tells Jaycees

He Says Concern Over Security Causes Pitfall

By BEN REEVES

In our present concern for safety and security, we must see to it that freedom, too, is kept alive.

That, Edward R. Murrow said here last night, is the gravest challenge of our time.

The Columbia Broadcasting System news analyst and commentator had some ideas about freedom, too.

"Freedom is not to be bought in the bargain basement — nor for a lump sum. It must be paid for and argued about by each succeeding generation.

Remarks Made at Dinner

"Freedom may be hammered to death on the anvil of war, or it may be nibbled away, or wither from neglect, or come to be regarded as a luxury we can't afford," he said.

Murrow's comments were made at a dinner in the Jefferson County Armory honoring the "10 outstanding young men of 1954," chosen by the United States Junior Chamber of Commerce.

One of the pitfalls into which freedom may fall, he said, is our thinking that any national or world emergency justifies putting our traditional liberties in moth balls.

Freedom Called Only Safety

There has been more acquiescence in that kind of thinking than is healthy for us as a nation, Murrow said.

"Too many people have mistakenly thought it was necessary to be undemocratic in dealing with the emergency.

But, in the Cold War, there is no safety whatever unless we remain free.

"Democracy is our one chance of survival. For if we emerge from the long crisis undevastated by war, but no longer free, we have but chosen the cheapest and least heroic way to give tyranny the victory."

Defends Right to Dissent

Murrow defended the right to dissent as basic to a democratic society.

He said that, in time of war, a democracy can decide not to be completely democratic and place certain restraints on dissent. But it expects those restraints to be removed when the war is over, he said.

"The test of validity in reducing freedom is not simply danger, it is the immediacy of danger."

These days, all curbs on freedom are justified or excused on the ground that we are in a cold war, and that our survival is just as much at stake as if we were in a hot one, he said.

Wants Justice of Courts

Murrow said he does not believe the national danger so acute that persons accused of disloyalty should be denied the justice of the courts.

"I do not refer to those who have been placed behind prison bars after a trial, but to those who have been branded and stigmatized as with a hot iron without a trial."

Murrow said that if an atmosphere is created in which dissent and individual thinking are penalized, the tendency of the citizens will be to keep quiet. That would lead to a static society in which democracy cannot thrive, he added.

Some persons are now asking that democracy be made dormant, he said.

Says Freedom Must Survive

"But we must realize that democracy can not be kept alive by putting it to sleep. . . . One freedom that does not make sense, even in a cold war, is the freedom to reduce freedom."

Murrow said freedom must survive in the United States or it will not survive anywhere "on this minor planet."

"Our strength lies not alone in our armaments. We must have moral grounds upon which to stand and fight, if fight we must."

The noted C.B.S. commentator was introduced by Barry Bingham, editor of The Courier-Journal, who termed him "a man of courage and intelligence, who knows how to use his courage intelligently."

About 1,700 persons sat at banquet tables on a floor that only

Veto Certain On Tax Cuts, Reed States

Republican Raps Reported Drive By Democrats

Washington, Jan. 22.—Representative Reed said today the Democrats face a certain presidential veto if they carry through reported plans for a tax cut in 1955.

The New York Republican, who waged a notable but losing battle for tax cuts early in the Eisenhower Administration, denounced as "political jockeying" Democratic talk of tax reductions this year in the face of President Eisenhower's call for no further change in the nation's tax structure before 1956.

The veteran lawmaker, senior Republican on the tax-writing House Ways and Means Committee and its chairman in the last Congress, blasted talk of tax reductions now as "an act of unpardonable irresponsibility."

Drive for Cuts Reported

His remarks came in the wake of reports that Democrats on the Ways and Means Committee were considering running a general tax cut through Congress this year, instead of following the President's lead to put off any changes until 1956, an election year.

In his budget message to Congress, Eisenhower not only recommended against any further reduction in tax revenues but also called for another year's extension of existing excise and corporation tax rates which are due to drop April 1.

"I hope that tax reductions will be justified next year," the President said, but he declared that for the present "we must keep our existing revenues intact."

Says Opposition Will Form

Reed said in a statement that if Democrats "persist in their attempts to scuttle the Administration's tax program, they will run into determined opposition from Republicans and many Democrats who place the fiscal solvency of the nation above political jockeying."

"Furthermore," Reed said, "if successful, they will run into a certain presidential veto and there are sufficient votes in both houses of Congress to defeat such irresponsible legislation."

Reed accused "certain Democrats, for political purposes," of hoping to embarrass the President. He said they would only embarrass themselves by pushing through their own program.

Hits Democratic Years

Reviewing the tax overhaul performed by the last Congress, Reed said the Eisenhower Administration had every reason to be proud of its efforts in behalf of taxpayers who, he said, "received no consideration under previous administrations during a 20-year period."

"The New Deal and Fair Deal were constantly riding on the taxpayer's back," Reed said. "That trend has now been reversed.

"We have given and will give further tax cuts when the fiscal situation of our country permits. You have the President's word for it. You have my word for it.

Reed Lost 1953 Fights

"To ignore the Government's need for revenue to support a strong military and civilian establishment, as some Democrats are apparently suggesting, is an act of unpardonable irresponsibility."

In 1953 Reed fought for elimination of the excess-profits tax on corporations, which the Administration wanted continued, and for a cut in personal-income taxes, which the Administration said the country could not afford. He lost on both counts.

Later the excess-profits tax was dropped and an income-tax cut took effect.

K.E.A. Won't Support Sales Tax, Candidates

Educators Decide To Campaign Only for Pledges By Political Leaders of Funds for Foundation

Kentucky Education Association leaders yesterday decided to stick with K.E.A. policy of not allying the group with specific political candidates.

Nor will the K.E.A. endorse a sales tax or other specific tax proposal aimed at getting more State money for education.

However, the leaders agreed, a vigorous campaign will be waged to get the support of political leaders and lawmakers for the K.E.A. program.

Core of the program is financial support for Kentucky's new minimum foundation program for education.

'Somebody Will Symbolize It'

"If we get our program moving, somebody will symbolize it, don't worry about that," said Dr. Adron Doran, president of Morehead College and former speaker of the State House of Representatives.

K.E.A. directors, planning-board members, and leaders of K.E.A.'s 11 district associations met at the Brown Hotel Friday and yesterday. Purpose was to plan a campaign to get widespread support for financing the program.

The 1954 General Assembly enacted the foundation program, which aims at providing a minimum level for all Kentucky school children in housing, transportation, and instruction.

But $17,600,000 more a year would be needed to finance the program fully at the present time.

Discussion Lively

Whether K.E.A. leaders should commit themselves on how they proposed to raise the extra money provoked lively discussion at yesterday's session.

Porter Hopkins, Somerset, a K.E.A. director, warned during the meeting that "You'll be asked, 'Are you in favor of a sales tax or are you 'agin' it?' "

He indicated he was not suggesting that the K.E.A. change its policy, but that the subject might stand examination.

TRAFFIC-SAFETY CLASS . . . These Cincinnati children, using tricycles as automobiles, are learning traffic safety and the "feel of the wheel" at a nursery school.

Nursery-School Children Being Taught Safe Driving

By The Associated Press

Cincinnati, Jan. 22.—Two University of Cincinnati child-development experts aren't so sure that "it's never too late to learn," but they insist it's never too early to learn.

With that in mind, they're teaching 3-, 4-, and 5-year-old toddlers at the U. C. College of Home Economics nursery school how to drive.

But don't get alarmed. The children aren't being put behind the steering wheel of an automobile. The teaching is being done with blocks, chairs, and tricycles. The teachers are Dr. Ruth Highberger and Mrs. Martha Ransohoff.

The "Speeders" Are Warned

During the play periods, the youngsters ride their tricycles and there are the usual tangles.

"You upset because you were going too fast," the "speeders" are warned and the instructor points out that other persons have rights of way and the "driver" must be aware of them.

In the schoolroom the children arrange blocks or chairs to form make-believe buses or passenger automobiles and they are taught how to stand up and how to behave otherwise in an automobile.

"Automobile safety is just horse sense," says Mrs. Ransohoff. "Parents already know these things, but it is always good to think about them again. It is important to remember that parents' driving habits, their attitude toward other drivers and the law are carefully observed and imitated by the children."

Dr. Highberger said the children are told they can pretend to be driving a car, but they are warned that the actual driving—touching the steering wheel or the gear shift—is an adult responsibility.

"You just cannot wait until they start driving to teach safe driving," Mrs. Ransohoff declared. "Children understand at an early age and they enjoy it then."

Crash Kills 3 Knox Men On Dixie

2 Others Are Hurt As Car Hits Truck

Three Fort Knox soldiers were killed and two others were injured yesterday when their car struck the rear of a truck-trailer on Dixie Highway in Muldraugh, Ky.

State Trooper H. R. Vierkant said the truck was making a U-turn from north to south in the four-lane highway. The car was headed toward Louisville in the inner lane. The car struck the trailer and most of the car's left side was ripped off, Vierkant said.

The dead were identified as Frank E. Holmes, 28, driver of the car; Jack McCullogh, 23, and Lee Murphy, 24.

One Is In Hospital

Warren Poole, 22, was admitted to Brick Hospital at Fort Knox with internal injuries. Earl Gates, Jr., was treated there for minor injuries.

The driver of the truck Billy J. Mitchell, Rainsville, Ala., was not injured.

The accident occurred shortly before 6 p.m.

Witnesses told State police that the soldiers' car struck some gasoline pumps at a nearby service station after hitting the trailer. The car left the road and stopped in a field about 150 yards from the scene of the accident.

Says He Saw No Cars

Mitchell told police that he had pulled off the side of the road and parked to get a haircut. He said he saw no cars coming when he started to make the U-turn to resume his southward journey.

Mitchell said only two or three feet of the trailer was in the northbound lane when the car struck it.

Gates told police that the car was hurrying to Louisville so that one of the soldiers might catch a train there.

State police filed no charges in the accident.

Conservatives Retain Seat In By-election

Orpington, England, Jan. 22 (AP)—Prime Minister Winston Churchill's Conservative Party today retained its parliamentary seat in a special by-election here.

Conservative W.D.M. Sumner polled 20,082 votes to gain a majority of 9,656 over Laborite R. D. Vaughan Williams. Sumner fills the vacancy left by the death of Sir Waldron Smithers.

Male Trips Up Adair County

Male High School upset unbeaten Adair Countl, 53 to 51, last night to win the Louisville Invitational Tournament at Male Gym. Adair went into the game a favorite because of 20 straight victories this season.

The University of Kentucky disposed of Tennessee, 84 to 66, at Knoxville.

Morehead and Furman got into adding-machine figures, with Morehead piling up 130 points to Furman's 117, possibly a record for college basketball totals. Darrell Floyd, the nation's leading scorer, got 67 for Furman.

Olive Hill Girl Wins Soil Essay Test

Gets $100 Bond For Her Report On Conservation

A 14-year-old Olive Hill High School freshman has been named state winner in the 11th annual Soil Conservation Essay Contest.

Betty Lou Burton, of Olive Hill, will receive a $100 United States Savings Bond for her entry "How Water Conservation Benefits My Community." Her essay was judged best of more than 13,000 entries from 115 soil-conservation districts. Contest prizes total $3,225.

Charles M. Cutshaw, Georgetown Route 1, will receive a $50 bond, and Eula Ray Sweazy, Gravel Switch, a $25 bond.

Announcement of the winner and runners-up was made by Barry Bingham, president of The Courier-Journal and Louisville Times, and WHAS.; Wendell P. Butler, State superintendent of public instruction, and Augustus Threlkeld, president of the Kentucky Association of Soil Conservation Districts.

Get Trip to Louisville

The contest was sponsored by the newspapers and radio-television station in co-operation with the conservation group and the State Department of Education.

In addition to the bonds, the three winners will receive expense-paid trips to Louisville to attend the farm-awards luncheon February 12. Here they will meet with winners in thre other contests in the farm incentive program of the newspapers and radio-television station.

Miss Burton is the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Eugene Burton. She is a member of the Future Homemakers of America Club and won first place in the Carter County Cancer Essay Contest in 1953 and 1954. She was runner-up in her county in the 1953 Soil Conservation Essay Contest.

In her essay she said that proper water conservation helps to prevent floods and water pollution and to provide water power, to replenish or conserve moisture and plant nutrients in the soil, and thereby to benefit the entire community.

She said that watershed protection "benefits both the individual and the community because it recognizes the relationship of each piece of land to all the others and applies to each piece of land those practices needed to prevent erosion and make the soil absorb more water.

"Most of the damage in smaller areas," she wrote, "is caused from frequent small floods that start on the uplands and in tributaries. They become larger as they flow downstream damaging livestock, land, crops, and roads. Watershed-protection programs will reduce or completely elim-

Green, said "I don't believe we can go much longer without spelling it out in terms of dollars." He said a sales tax in Tennessee had raised several million dollars for education.

Butler Thinks It's Unwise

But Wendell P. Butler, State superintendent of public instruction, said he didn't think it wise to hitch K.E.A.'s wagon to any form of financing.

"Is it wise to endorse a sales tax when you don't have a horse running?" he asked.

He referred to reports that John Young Brown, Lexington, has considered seeking the Democratic nomination for Governor on a sales-tax platform.

Butler told a reporter later he thought that only Court of Appeals Judge Bert T. Combs and former Governor A. B. Chandler—both announced candidates—would seek the Democratic nomination.

Both Probably Oppose It

Both are presumably opposed to a sales tax. And Butler said he thought both would endorse the K.E.A. program.

Dr. Lyman V. Ginger, Lexington, K.E.A. president, commented: "We do not want to be allied with a candidate for the governor's race, the lieutenant governor's race, or another candidate's race. We're talking about an improved program of education for Kentucky."

Dr. Ginger added that the Legislative Research Commission is conducting a large-scale study of Kentucky's tax structure and of possible untapped sources of revenue. This study may furnish the General Assembly with answers as to "where to get the money," he said.

Timetable Committee Named

A three-member committee was appointed to adopt a general timetable of actions to be followed in the next few months by K.E.A. district organizations.

Suggestions to promote the program included setting up speakers' bureaus, supporting a school speaking contest proposed by the Kentucky Bankers Association, drawing up catchy slogans, getting endorsements from civic clubs, and inviting General Assembly candidates to express their views on the program.

P.-T.A. Backs Action

Members of the special committee, appointed by Carlos Oakley, K.E.A. first vice-president, were Dr. N. B. McMillian and Mrs. Carolyn Bergmann, both of Louisville, and Mrs. James G. Sheehan, Danville.

Mrs. Sheehan, as immediate past president of the Kentucky Congress of Parents and Teachers, and Ralph Fontaine, Kentucky Bankers Association executive secretary, offered their organizations' support of the K.E.A. program in talks Friday night.

armed motorized craft Thursday—the day the Nationalists said the invading Reds wiped out the last resistance on Yikiangshan.

ationalist Premier O. K. Yui told newsmen Saturday his Government "firmly opposed" any idea of withdrawing from the Tachens. He said so far he had not heard of any such proposal officially.

At Manila Saturday, Carlos P Garcia, Vice-President and Secretary of Philippines Foreign Affairs, said the United States should help defend smaller islands such as the Tachens.

'Should Protect Tachens'

"We should take steps to defend the Tachens and similar islands to protect Formosa," he told a press conference.

"Formosa, if ultimately taken, is the gateway to the Philippines. If Formosa is taken, we should get ready for something to happen here."

A top foreign-affairs adviser to President Ramon Magsaysay said the reported possibility of a cease-fire between Nationalist and Red China was "disturbing" to the Philippines.

In Taipeh, a Nationalist official who refused to be quoted by name said:

"A cease-fire would be another Marshall mission. The only people who would benefit would be the Chinese Communists."

His reference was to the postwar mission of General George C. Marshall who tried to bring about a truce between Chiang and the Reds.

Yikiangshan Bombed

Nationalist warplanes bombed Yikiangshan Friday night and Saturday for the first time since its 720 guerrilla defenders were defeated by a Red invading force of an estimated 5,000 Marines and infantrymen. The raiding planes ran into antiaircraft fire.

Nationalist Air Force Headquarters also reported damaging Red shipping 16 miles southwest and 13 miles northwest of the Tachens.

The Tachens were under an air-raid alarm Saturday as eight Russian-built MIG-15 jets and 12 propeller-driven Red fighters roared over the area. The defense Ministry did not report any attacks on the Tachens by the raiders.

Man Sleeps On as Train Passes Right Over Him

Puyallup, Wash., Jan. 22 (U.P.)—They say even a freight train can't wake D. C. McCoskey of Puyallup when he decides to take a nap—and today he proved it.

Puyallup police said the 56-year-old McCoskey told them he grew tired on his way home last night and lay down to rest a bit. His resting spot happened to be between the railway tracks that run through here.

A freight train came along this morning and engineer Fred Moser didn't see the sleeping man until the engine was practically over him. The engine and 30 cars passed over McCoskey before Moser got the train stopped.

Trainmen rushed to McCoskey, expecting the worst. But all McCoskey—who was still sound asleep—suffered was two small cuts. He told police he didn't remember a thing.

Freedom Must Live, Murrow Tells Jaycees

24 hours earlier had been the scene of a basketball game. A three-tiered speakers' table rising on the west side of the building dominated row on row of white tables.

Sitting at the highest table were the persons the big event was all about—the 10 outstanding young men.

LaMar Buckner, Ogden, Utah, national president of the Junior Chamber of Commerce, called them down, one at a time, to present the Jaycees' distinguished-service-award plaques for 1954.

Yeager Came First

First came Maj. Charles E. Yeager, the Air Force test pilot who first broke the sound barrier. He said he accepted the award "on behalf of all the fellows in our services who stick their necks out a little bit just for devotion to duty."

Next came Dr. William A. Spencer, the Houston, Tex., physician whose research in polio rehabilitation has helped hundreds. He said the award was in recognition of his profession's constant search for scientific knowledge to benefit all men.

Dr. Frank A. Rose—only Kentuckian on the list—president of Transylvania College, Lexington, received his award, he said, as a recognition for the work and help of his staff, his faculty, and his friends.

Says Athletics Recognized

Hamilton F. Richardson came next. The 21-year-old Tulane University law student and Davis Cup tennis player from Baton Rouge, La., said he felt the award to him as a recognition "of the vital part athletics play in the American way of life."

Dr. Wendell Phillips, Concord, Cal., explorer of some of the world's more remote places, accepted his award as "a recognition to explorers all over the world."

The Kansas City, Kan., painter and sculptor, Arthur M. Kraft, made his acceptance short. "I try to communicate with people with the brush and chisel," he said, shyly.

Investigator Honored

Robert F. Kennedy said his award could properly go to the staff of all Congressional investigating committees, who are doing yeoman service to the nation. Kennedy, from Boston, is chief counsel to the Senate permanent subcommittee on investigation.

The other scientist on the list, Dr. J. Herbert Hollomon, Schenectady, a research metallurgist, said he was faintly confused. "I don't understand how the U. S. Junior Chamber of Commerce found its way into the woodwork and picked me," he said.

Lieutenant Governor Ernest F. Hollings of South Carolina said he owed his award to his family and his friends. "No one pulls himself up by his own bootstraps," he said.

Brennan Was Last

The last on the list was Terence P. Brennan, the 28-year-old head football coach at the University of Notre Dame. He said his acceptance speech was "the oratorical equivalent of a blocked punt."

"You are not honoring me," he said. "You are honoring all athletic coaches."

The 10 were selected from hundreds of nominees by a panel of judges selected by the National Jaycee organization.

More than 2,000 members of the organization, from all 48 states and Hawaii, were in Louisville attending the dinner and the accompanying events.

inate these damages in small watersheds."

Cutshaw wrote in his 2d-place essay that good crop and livestock production depends on conserving and building up the soil.

He is junior-class president and F.F.A. president at Great Crossing High School as well as editor of his school paper. In 1953 he placed first in Scott County in the Soil Conservation Essay Contest. His parents are Mr. and Mrs. Vernon Cutshaw.

The third-place winner, Miss Sweazy, said she became interested in soil conservation by watching her father and other farmers in her area care for their land. She is an active 4-H Club member and her entry placed first in the Marion County and district beef competition last fall. She attends Lebanon High School and is the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. R. W. Sweazy.

Open to All Students

The essay contest is open to regularly enrolled grade- or high-school students in Kentucky. The writer of the best essay in each school receives a certificate of merit signed by the contest sponsor and the principal of the school.

Floyd County led the state by submitting a high total of 1,685 essays for judging. Other soil-conservation districts with a large number of entries include Letcher, 836; Caldwell, 777; Monroe, 564; Laurel, 517, and Grant, 510.

Awards of a $25 Savings Bond and a certificate of achievement go to the winner in each district where at least five essays were written. Runners-up in each district also receive a certificate.

Winners of $25 awards listed by soil-conservation districts are:

Ike To Tell Congress Of Plans on Formosa

fense of Formosa and the Pescadores.

The proposed Congressional action would serve as a warning to the Chinese Communists, who have repeatedly said they plan to attack Formosa and who this week captured the small island of Yikiangshan from guerrilla forces under Nationalist leader Chiang Kai-shek.

There was no definite indication how specific Eisenhower's message would be in drawing a defense line. Martin said Eisenhower would probably define clearly the area this Government would feel justified in defending.

Won't Draw A Blueprint

But a White House source, declining to be further identified, said "We are not going to draw blueprints for the Communists."

This source said there is disagreement over the adequacy of the President's present powers. The request to Congress was decided on, he said, to clear up any haziness about the President's constitutional powers and to present a united America to the world.

Political Motive Hinted

Another apparent purpose of the move—to associate the Democrats with his action and thus cut off partisan criticism—was pointed up by Senator Mansfield of Montana, a Democratic member of the Foreign Relations Committee.

Mansfield said he believed the President could act without Congressional sanction, but that he apparently wanted "political protection" in ordering whatever military moves the defense of Formosa might require.

Former President Truman, he recalled, was later bitterly criticized for ordering U. S. troops into Korea without consulting Congress.

Part of Policy Since '49

The defense of Formosa has been an implied part of U. S. policy ever since the Red Chinese captured the Mainland and Chiang Kai-shek moved his forces to the island fortress. Since the start of the Korean War in 1950, the U. S. Seventh Fleet has patrolled the area.

The United States and Nationalist China have since signed a treaty specifically pledging U. S. defense of Formosa and the nearby Pescadores against Communist attack, but the treaty has not yet been formally ratified.

The possibility of a special message to Congress has been discussed since Thursday, when Secretary of State Dulles briefed Congressional leaders on the Far Eastern situation.

Discussion centered then around a possible request for specific authority to use U. S. naval and air power to protect Nationalist forces in a regrouping and withdrawal from some of the offshore islands if a strong Communist attack made such a move advisable.

'Should Be No Appeasement'

Today's action followed a comment by Representative Richards (D., S. C.), chairman of the House Foreign Affairs Committee, that there should be no "appeasement, fear, or weakness" in this country's Formosa policy.

Russia and Red China must be made to understand, he said in an interview, that "if new lines are established as the best military perimeter for the defense of Formosa, we will defend it, by arms if necessary, and retreat no farther. . . .

"It would risk a shooting war," he added, "but we run a far greater risk the other way. If the line is not drawn here, it will have to be drawn farther down the road."

Senator Morse (Ind., Ore.) said in a radio interview tonight that, "Southeast Asia should be brought under United Nations jurisdiction as rapidly as possible, and that American unilateral action, particularly in the Formosa Straits, should come to an end. I think of it as a great mistake for the United States to take upon itself the full responsibility of policing the Formosa area . . ."

French Premier To Face Issues At Home Now

Paris, Jan. 22 (AP)—Premier Pierre Mendes-France told his countrymen tonight that his Government is going to concentrate now on domestic problems, most of them economic and social.

That was the explanation the Premier gave in a nationwide radio and television address on the past week's Cabinet reshuffle, in which he relinquished the foreign-affairs post to former Finance Minister Edgar Faure.

He said France's foreign-relations problems are far from solved, but that the "essential directions" of foreign policy have been settled with the Assembly's approval of the Paris-London accords.

Toledo Community Orchestra May Be Forced To Disband

Special to The New York Times and The Courier-Journal

Toledo, Jan. 22.—The Toledo Orchestra, with 100 applicants seeking the conductor's post to be vacated at season's end, may lose its musical existence.

It has a $10,000 deficit of a $49,100 budget. In addition, business and industry contributions have dropped.

For these reasons, William H. Mauk, association president, said today the orchestra would cancel its February and March evening concerts.

It also may be necessary to cancel the February and March children's concerts, he said, although the association hopes to keep its commitment to the Edward H. Lamb Foundation, which provides a $5,000 annual grant for the young people's series.

Conductor Resigns

Mauk termed the ending of a community orchestra as a "serious step," but he warned that the orchestra may be disbanded by season's end.

There has been a community orchestra locally since 1939. Six years ago, Wolfgang Stresemann was hired as resident conductor. He resigned several months ago, effective at the close of the season.

The 64-piece orchestra, composed of professional and semi-professional musicians, was scheduled for 11 concerts this season. The Toledo City Council appropriated $10,000 to the orchestra this year.

Cash Box Is Shot From Robber's Hand

Winchester, Ky., Jan. 22 (AP)—A holdup victim tonight recovered $500 taken from his service station-grocery by shooting the cash box from the would-be robber's hand.

Lindsay Paynter told officers a man and woman entered the store, ordered beer, and then the man drew a gun and grabbed the cash box.

Paynter got his own pistol and shot at the fleeing pair, the bullet tearing the cash box from the man's grasp. The couple escaped by car.

Actor Alan Ladd's Daughter Weds

Hollywood, Jan. 22 (U.P.)—Alan Ladd's daughter, Carol Lee Ladd, walked over the family swimming pool to marry actor Dick Anderson in an outdoor wedding tonight.

The 21-year-old bride stepped down an avenue of candles and across a bridge built over the huge pool to repeat her vows as hundreds of celebrities watched on the lawn behind the Ladd mansion in Holmby Hills.

The Rev. A. J. Soldan of the Lutheran Church in Westwood Village conducted the ceremony in the patio which was covered by a huge tent in case of rain.

Syrians To Be Allowed Travel Without Visas

Damascus, Syria, Jan. 22 (AP)—The Syrian Parliament today passed a bill permitting travel to other Arab countries without visas. The measure allows all Arab citizens to enter Syria without visas, but Syrians may enter freely only other Arab states which have adopted a like measure. Iraq and Jordan already have passed similar laws.

Eisenhower Postpones Health-Needs Message

Special to The New York Times and The Courier-Journal

Washington, Jan. 22.—The White House announced today that President Eisenhower's special message on the country's health needs will not be sent to Congress on Monday as had been planned.

James C. Hagerty, the President's press secretary, said the message was postponed because of the emergency message Eisenhower now plans to give Congress Monday on the Far Eastern situation.

The health message will probably be sent to Congress Tuesday.

Dear Joel:

I have your note of June 15th and am sorry that there has been no time for us to talk before I leave for the summer.

Frankly, I have no helpful suggestions as to how you might get back with CBS in the near future. From what I hear the field is pretty crowded.

Dear Ed,

I've been directing STAR TONIGHT (ABC-TV) for Thompson since the show was organized in January. But, as you know, I've wanted for a long time to get back to CBS, and I feel this added credit might make a difference.

I talked to your gal trying to set up an appointment, but no luck. Hence the letter. Have you a ten minute spot any time before you leave for the summer?

Your shows have been terrific. Especially the Oppenheimer stanza. That was the most literate half-hour I've ever seen.

Best wishes,

Many thanks for your note of June 18th.

We are still hoping to do a program on Scotland. We just haven't been able to schedule it yet. However, if we have patience, the perfect opportunity will undoubtedly present itself so please assure your friends that it is by no means a dead issue.

My friends at the Scottish Council in Edinburgh have asked me to enquire whether there is anything they can do to stimulate your interest in doing a broadcast on their country.

When I brought that delegation to see you, you made the mistake of giving them a little encouragement, and I have subsequently found it impossible to persuade them that you had turned down the idea.

Any hope?

I must apologize for having taken so long to reply to your very nice note of May 10. The end of the season found me buried under an avalanche of mail and I have been spending the first part of my vacation trying to answer it.

We are still considering doing a piece on Scotland, but as yet have been unable to make any definite plans. I will certainly let you know as soon as anything develops in that direction.

Please forgive the belatedness of my reply to your letter of December 1. The holiday season has been such a busy one, and I am only now beginning to catch up with my correspondence.

My dear Mr. Murrow,

A very distinguished educator, an old friend of mine, Mr. Laverne Irvine, of Ruston, La. TECH, has been surveying the needs of colleges in the way of educational programs in assembly, lectures, artist series, and the like, other than the expensive Great Artist Series already supplied by Columbia Concerts. My friend Irvine has had great experience for a lot of years in supplying college student audiences with entertainment which is educational and education that is entertaining. So much for that. He has a well thought out plan based upon many years of practical experience.

Irvine has written me to say that he has applied to the Ford Foundation requesting that they interest themselves in this very worthwhile project, i.e., the development of a nationwide plan of acceptable Assembly Programs for students. He has seen your name listed among the important Board Members, hence his letter to me asking that I endeavor to see you about it.

I think what I have said above is more or less self-explanatory, but if you would like to have me drop in to go over some points that may not be clear in this letter, I would be only too glad to do so.

With congratulations on your continuous great programs which we watch with much satisfaction, and personal regards, believe me

Sincerely yours,

Geoffrey O'Hara

Dear Ed:

Attached to this letter are some of the dabbles in acceptance correspondence for that project I wrote you about called OPERATION HOMETOWN, wherein we send USAF officers back to their hometowns as commencement speakers or suitable similar occasions akin to that season.

Up to now, more than 50 have been accepted.

Also, along with this, you'll find the speaker's guide and admonitions which go to each participant.

Surely do appreciate your interest, whether or not it makes up into a SEE IT NOW.

Good to see you again the other day, even though I was next in line after Marilyn. Hope you did better with your opportunity than I did with mine. When she was making THERE'S NO BUSINESS LIKE SHOW BUSINESS, I was in Hollywood getting various movie stars to say a kind word about the Ground Observer Corps and she was suggested. The press agent told her I would be glad to write the one-minute spot for her, whereupon she cooed:

"And what kind of words does this Colonel want to put in my mouth?"

Of all the things I COULD have said, I stuck to the party line and plugged for the Ground Observer Corps!

Very best regards,

Replying to your letter of February 2nd, we are interested in what you have to say about Colonel Mathews. I remember him with a great deal of pleasure and I suppose he will possibly remember me. It would give us considerable pleasure to have him deliver our commencement address.

Our Commencement Day is Wednesday, June 8th. The exercises are in the forenoon. If Colonel Mathews would consider coming to us at that time, he may consider this as an invitation. I would like to hear from you or from him about it.

Your letter of March 3 was referred to the Lyceum Committee in our last faculty meeting. We are very much interested in having Lt. Colonel Albert H. Fallows speak to our students. We feel that it is important enough that we would have the entire studentbody hear the Lt. Colonel Albert H. Fallows' talk.

We have very few dates open from now until school is out. If it is convenient for you, we have the date of April 5 open and would like the Colonel to talk to the entire studentbody for about forty-five minutes commencing at eleven o'clock.

Dear Sir:

We would be very pleased to have Capt. Eaton as our Commencement speaker if suitable arrangements can be made (your letter suggesting him was sent February 15). As we have usually used talent in our immediate vicinity in the past, our expenses for Commencement speakers has thus been kept at a minimum. We would very much like to have Capt. Eaton, but can not afford to be out very much to secure him. Just what would the expense to us be in order to secure His services through your Bureau?

Our Commencement is scheduled for Thursday, May 26, at 8 p.m.

We appreciate the interest of the Air Force in suggesting the use of Capt. Eaton,...and recognize the timely nature of addresses such as speakers from your Bureau would give us. Incidentally, Capt. Eaton is an outstanding product of our highschool and highly respected by our community.

Please let us know at your earliest convience (1) how much it would cost to secure Capt. Eaton and (2) if he can be released to us on the date of May 26,...in order that we can make definite arrangements.

Respectfully yours,

Richard M. Rouse

COHIS

4 March 1955

SUBJECT: Speaker's Guide for "Operation Hometown

TO: All Speakers Scheduled for Participation

1. General. Both government and military leaders have repeatedly stated that there will be a "long pull" requirement for a posture of military strength. Recent decisions have put more than half of that posture into the hands of the United States Air Force, hence a need for widespread public understanding exists as to the air power role and its manning. The likelihood is with us that nearly every able-bodied male graduate of a high school will be slotted in the military effort somewhere, many of them in the USAF. Almost as sure is that the girl graduate may share a part of that experience as a married military dependent, or she may go into uniform herself. It is natural then that there is great concern among graduates, under-graduates, and their parents about the nature of military service and its opportunities for a rich, full life. "Operation Hometown" has been conceived to put a former member of a given high school now in the USAF back as a speaker during graduation time into that community and school from which he came. Since he is known first as one from that city or area, and only secondarily as in uniform, his reception will be accorded him more on the first premise and only incidentally on the second. He should strive to leave after this speaking engagement with the community feeling it is well represented in the USAF and that the oncoming crops of graduates can feel more reassured about electing USAF service and careers.

2. Objectives. Speakers are not going into these schools to deliver a recruiting talk, but there are certain objectives which should be clearly understood by all speakers and their remarks design should support them. The objectives, in almost chronological order, include:

a. To reaffirm your ties, or roots with community and school in which you talk, in order to show that you are not unique. You began in that town, you are presumably known well in it, and your starting equipment was maybe equal to, but no better than those who are leaving school in the class of 1955.

b. To give credit before that community and to its individuals where appropriate for counsel, advice, help and personal guidance which has been useful or applicable for you in your military career, or the career you may have had before you settled in the USAF.

c. To point out how a military career was most unlikely for anyone at the time of your own graduation (service maybe, but not career), yet such was the nature of world affairs in your own generation that these career patterns became necessary as they continue to be more and more today, and why.

d. To show that for the first time in almost 100 years, a war fought in and over this country is again a possibility rather than going off to some foreign land to fight as has been the pattern and that the switch of the U. S. from arsenal to prime target is the reason for this vast alert and readiness program.

e. To outline air power and weapons in the hands of the potential enemy which makes this probable, and the requirement which is on us in the air power system to be strong enough first to deter and secondarily to fight off such an attack if it starts against us.

f. To indicate by anecdotes of your own personal travels, jobs, and types of assignments, and the experiences of your wife and children, what has gone along with this world-wide rigging of that air power rebuttal as a suggestion of what may be in store for the graduate.

3. Speech Pattern. Each man makes a speech or presentation a different way and in the manner which best suits him and his personality, to the following format is offered only as a guide, not a rigid rule, and includes:

a. Reference to your homecoming, and some humorous or human interest memories of your old classmates, singling some out if they are in the audience.

b. Reference to roots you acquired in that town, the men and women, living and dead who you remember as having been influential in your life pattern.

c. Follow out the objectives as outlined above either drawing on your own material, or referring to the speeches attached which have developed this theme.

d. Anecdotes of your own military service to show the extreme flexibility required, the family adjustments, the individual's role in world affairs.

e. Your own counsel to the class of 1955 as you see it, with overtones of reassurance to look forward to military service if it is their lot with healthy curiosity, as a milestone of importance in their role as a citizen, and possibly a career.

4. Admonitions. Each man who takes on this particular speaker's role, as envisioned in "Operation Hometown", is not taking on an easy one.

a. Remember that you are going home to do this, and that this is the hardest and frankest place on earth to be judged.

b. You are well known there, so don't go home important, go home with humility.

c. You will find that few, if any, have ever been invited back to your hometown in the same light that you are returning, so this is an honor which is being given you.

d. You are being brought back because your experience is thought to be worthy, you are trusted, your school is proud of you and your attainments, and you have a sphere of influence into which they are willing to entrust the community's youth.

e. You can advance yourself in their estimation, or you can stop dead in your tracks -- and stop the USAF with you. These are your responsibilities.

Dear Mr. Murrow:

Omaha, Nebraska, is now the safest city traffic-wise in the nation in the 200,000 to 350,000 population group.

It has achieved this status by having the fewest deaths per number of regustered vehicles of any city its size. Last year, 1953, saw only 13 deaths, which compared to an average of 23 deaths for the previous 3 years. This year Omaha has 10 deaths.

No little credit for this goes to Chief Omaha, the character which symbolizes the Omaha Safety Council. Chief Omaha has just one word of caution.."Sau-Be"..pronounced saw-bay. This is an Omaha Indian word meaning, "be careful".

Here is a brief summary of what Chief Omaha is doing for Omaha in the safety field:

He is on a weekly radio show each Saturday, and a weekly television show each Thursday morning.

Now the Omaha Junior Chamber of Commerce and the Omaha Safety Council is asking the United States Junior Chamber of Commerce and the leading network personalities to give this project a boost. Plans call for placing billboards at each entrance to Omaha, with the chief's face and the admonition..."Sau-Be, be careful".

A movie on child safety in traffic is being filmed for use in schools and before civic groups, with real Indian Tribal Dances being incorporated into the film and with the head of the Tribal Council of the Omaha Indian Tribe to portray Chief Omaha. This man's name is Gustavus White, of Macy, Nebraska.

Omaha as a whole, would appreciate some mention of Chief Omaha...Sau-Be, be careful... on your programs in order to make him as well known as other characters in the safety field, such as Smoky the forest fire fighter.

Your efforts in this program may well save many lives.

Sincerely,

Harry Hatcher

Mr. Leo DeOrsey has very kindly sent on your letter of November 2nd, and after having gone through the various offices here, it was referred to me.

We appreciate the very fine comments you make about our Mr. Callan. We're always glad to hear things like this, as we try to surround ourselves with the type of people our customers like to do business with.

It was nice of you to take time from your very busy day to write about Mr. Callan. He has been a special protege of mine for several years, even before he joined our organization. Everyone in the organization likes Scott, as we call him, and we all feel that he is a credit to our organization.

Your wire to Rosen is just right -- proving again how wrong "experts" can be.

We're going to give it the full treatment for Wednesday release in the columns -- and we're pushing hard with TIME. (NEWSWEEK reluctantly turned it down because a cover story has taken their space.)

On the broader front of trying to still these rumors once and for all -- our best weapon is continuing publicity on CBS' Edward R. Murrow.

I know how busy you are, and hate to eat up too much of your time, but I do want you to know that this gang is at your disposal and that we're all anxious to be both helpful and productive. Just yell.

Dear Mr. Murrow:

It has never been my practice to send letters to radio or TV personnel, but the sudden loss of Don Hollenbeck, which came as such an enervating blow to all who knew him, even casually as I did, forces me to do so.

I knew him personally only through intermittent contact with him on the "You Are There" series, but this all-too-abbreviated acquaintanceship, together with my devotion to him as a newscaster, first on radio and more recently on TV, were sufficient to win my respect for him as a man and an intellect.

I write to you, because I know no one else to whom he was close, and although I have never met you, my many years in your audience assures me that you will accept this sincere and inarticulate expression of sympathy and grief.

Dear Ed:

The other day I heard CSB may ask WEEB in my home town of Southern Pines to join the System. It was good news to us all and especially fitting, since this station under the able leadership of my friend, Jack Younts had just been awarded the North Carolina prize by AP for excellence in news broadcasting and protection to AP.

I appreciate your responsibilities do not include station arrangements but did want to add my approval to this project of joining WEEB to the CBS network. As you know, Southern Pines - Pinehurst houses a vastly different population from the average small community - one especially adapted to the type of broadcasting your network features - you - for instance!

Hope Janet, the banbino and you are just fine. Plan to come down our way. We would love to bend an elbow!

THE CHICAGO Defender

WORLD'S GREATEST WEEKLY

PUBLISHED BY THE ROBERT S. ABBOTT PUBLISHING CO.

EXECUTIVE OFFICES

April 15, 1955

Mr. Edward R. Murrow
Columbia Broadcasting Company
New York, New York

Dear Mr. Murrow:

On May 5, 1955 the Chicago Defender newspaper will be 50 years old, and will begin observance of its Golden Anniversary year by presenting President Dwight D. Eisenhower with the annual award commemorating its founder, Robert S. Abbott, at the White House.

The Defender is the most influential Negro newspaper in America, and stands at the head of a family of seven papers, including the National Defender, New York Age Defender, Louisville Defender, Michigan Chronicle, Tri State Defender and Gary Defender. It occupies its own plant in Chicago, where six of the seven papers are printed and employees more than 300 persons in all its offices and agencies.

The paper was founded by Robert S. Abbott, the son of former slaves, who launched the Defender with literally 25 cents and a determination to right the social injustices of American life. His first office was the kitchen of a State street rooming house. Today, his nephew, John H. Sengstacke, and heir is editor and publisher.

One of the principal events of the anniversary celebration will be the publication of Mr. Abbott's biography, "The Lonely Warrior," (Henry Regnery Company, May 17), by Roi Ottley, who you perhaps remember. President Eisenhower will receive the first copy of this significant book on May 5, along with the 9th annual Robert S. Abbott Memorial Award.

The point of this information is that the story of the Chicago Defender is an excellent subject for either of your programs, "See it Now," or "Person to Person."

In addition to the high interest which the inside of a newspaper plant holds, there are such personalities on our staff as Langston Hughes, Dr. Mary McLeod Bethune and Mr. Ottley. Our publisher, Mr. Sengstacke, is a member of the Virgin Islands Corporation (a federal agency), the board of the National Urban League, and the Illinois Commission on Human Relations. He also served on the President's Committee on Equality of Treatment and Opportunity in the Armed Services, a group which blue-printed the complete integration of our military forces.

The Defender has been described by Life Magazine as "the big Negro newspaper," by Time as "the most influential Negro newspaper," and by Carl Sandburg as the agency which caused the migration of a million Negroes to the North during World War I. Gunnar Myrdal called it one of the most important social factors in Negro life in "An American Dilemma."

Fifty years ago, the Defender began calling for abolition of segregation in public education and the outlawing of racial restrictive real estate covenants, steps which have been taken by the United States Supreme Court. It also called for admission of Negroes to trade unions, integration of the armed forces, employment of Negroes as police officers, and an end to lynching. All of these have been accomplished. The key statement of the Defender platform is "American Race Prejudice Must Be Destroyed," an objective to which all its employees and the overwhelming majority of its readers are devoted.

The anniversary celebration of the Chicago Defender will continue throughout calendar 1955, with a number of outstanding events.

I sincerely hope that you will be able to give consideration to the Defender story for one of your programs furing the coming months. We will be deeply appreciative of anything you can do.

Very truly yours,

Dear Ed:

I have just completed the biography of a remarkable Negro--Robert S. Abbott, who revolutionized the Negro press of the U.S., and in the process became a millionaire.

I pass this bit of information along to you for this reason: perhaps the Negro press generally might make the subject of a program, for it is the greatest single force in Negro life, though largely unseen by the white community.

My book, "The Lonely Warrior," which Regnery is publishing in May might provide your people with background material and perhaps insights.

Moreover, the paper Robert S. Abbott founded, The Chicago Defender, which is nationally circulated, celebrates 50 years of unbroken publication in May. It thus is one of the oldest institutions in the Negro community.

Incidentally, President Eisenhower will be awarded the "Robert S. Abbott Award" May 5th for his contributions to race relations progress by The Defender.

I think that if your cameras peered into the offices of the Defender and perhaps two or three other papers, the public might get an eye-opener!

Sincerely,

Roi

Once at least in your long public relations career you have misconstrued a situation. And in my long life- next July is my 72nd. birthday- I have encountered the first great misunderstanding.

In my letter to you of January 6, I enclosed my Education and Work Record merely as the simplest way to tell you that my deep appreciation of you and of your efforts came from considerable experience in living and in studying. As a matter of fact my letter to you was the first of it's kind I have ever written.

Dear Mr. Murrow:

From early 1942 to date I have been a consistent listener to your RADIO NEWS. When you Broadcast from over The BULGE it never seemed fantastic but quite normal for you.

From December 1952 -with the exception of 3 1/2 months in Mexico-I have been a consistent listener- feeling cheated if circumstances prevented it- and viewer of your T.V. Programs. And after each program -Radio and TV- I have been grateful to you.

Now, after your "Year of 1954" on Sunday January 2, 1955 and your "See It Now" of January 4, I can no longer refrain from expressing to you my deep appreciation. Also clear in my memory -among other programs- is that of Chancellor Adenaur and Pierre Mendes-France with those two wonderful C.B.S. Reporters from Germany and France and the one over Radio recently with those same Reporters.

To explain my deep interest and appreciation I enclose my Education and Work Record. In those days in France in the First World War I knew Lyman Bryson and more recently in Pasadena Steve Allen taught Radio Script Writing in my School for Professional Radio.

Again THANK YOU and may many of us have many more years of your reporting.

Dear Ed,

I am having mailed to you under separate cover this month a copy of Lord Ismay's book "NATO, The First Five Years". This volume was prepared primarily to provide a reference work for government officials and newspaper editors and correspondents on how the Atlantic Alliance works.

We hope you will find the book useful. If you care to review or otherwise comment on the book, we would be grateful. "NATO, The First Five Years" is being released for publication on Sunday, January 30th. I trust the advance copy I am sending you will reach you in time to give you a chance to have a good look at it before that date.

I have been working with NATO for a little over four years now and agree with Lord Ismay, that far from being just another international organization, NATO "is something new and exciting and revolutionary, the most challenging and constructive attempt in international relations ever attempted".

An official document such as Lord Ismay's 5-year report on NATO is, by its very nature, hardly the ideal medium for communicating "excitement", but I hope very much it will help you to get a picture of how the Alliance is working toward its basic objectives - no World War III, or if it should unhappily arrive, that we win.

Yours sincerely,

Dear Ed:

At Homecoming this year (November 5) we will be honoring the class of 1930 on their 25th anniversary. Our special guests will be the senior members of the '29 football team. This was your class and your year. As President of the ASSCW during the year 29-30, we invite you to return to the campus as our guest and be honored along with your class at Homecoming. The game this year is with University of Oregon.

We are well aware of your busy schedule and realize it may be impossible for you to be with us. If such is the case, I know your former classmates would appreciate your sending a short greeting. I would be most happy to read the message in your behalf at the Homecoming luncheon Saturday noon, November 5.

Of course we will not give up hope of your being with us on this particular occasion. If this is possible, please let me know of your plans so that adequate housing and other arrangements can be made.

Will be looking forward to hearing from you.

Dear Mr. Murrow:

On behalf of Mr. Duell and myself I wish to send this note of thanks to you and your staff for your kindness yesterday in allowing us to look at your Eartha Kitt interview. We are publishing a book by Miss Kitt and so many people had mentioned your interview, which both of us had missed, that we felt we ought to see it.

Having viewed this interesting interview, I wish to make a suggestion -- one which, I hasten to add, has nothing to do with my publishing or business interests. I wish you would interview and present to your wide public that very wonderful and impressive folk singer, Cynthia Gooding. As a longtime lover of folk songs I feel that Cynthia is -- in a word -- the best, and I believe your audience would share with you the thrill of a real "discovery," for Cynthia Gooding is as yet little known.

There are recordings of her singing, put out by the small Elektra firm, in English, Spanish, Turkish, and Italian. She has recently started an engagement at Jorie's Purple Onion (of all places!), having made limited appearances in one or two Greenwich Village spots. She has a pure contralto voice and her rendering of the old English folk songs offers, I feel, one of the most memorable and moving experiences we are likely to get in our time from any singer.

I have not heard her performance at Jorie's Purple Onion, but if you would care to visit the spot as my guest, I would be happy to go with you any evening that you select, preferring to catch the 10:30 to 11:00 show because I have to take a commuting train. We need not tell Miss Gooding in advance, but IF you should like her singing as much as I do and should wish to meet her after the show, I would consider it a privilege to introduce you.

Meantime, thanks again to you and your staff for yesterday's courtesies.

Yours sincerely,

Dear Mrs. Pemberton:

I regret very much the delay in answering your letter of May 31. Unfortunately the pressure of my radio and television schedule often makes it difficult for me to answer my personal mail within the time that politeness demands.

I am very sorry indeed to hear that you received no reply to the letter you wrote to me last Spring. That letter was, in fact, never received by me. If by last Spring you refer to the Spring of 1954, I think it possible that your letter may have arrived during the period that this office was being deluged with literally thousands of letters.

The volume was so tremendous that it was impossible for my personal staff to take care of it and it had to be handled elsewhere than in my office. It is entirely possible that if your letter was sent at that time it may have been opened by someone who failed to realize that it should be brought to my attention.

Dear Miss Campbell:

just a short note to thank you for your letter of the 5th.

I regret that there is no opening on Mr. Murrow's staff at this time, but hope that I shall be remembered in the future. Please, be good enough to make a note of the fact that I speak quite fluently German and French which might come in handy if and when your organization does work in Europe.

Sincerely:

Dear Ed:

Mrs. Pickett and I were so interested and moved the other evening when we watched your interview with Nehru that we decided to let you know how deeply we appreciated that program. Evidently Nehru was his usual timid but thoughtful self and your questions at least from our point of view were most appropriate. Thanks for a very good job done.

Dear Mr. Piffard:

Very many thanks for your letter of September 5, and for the manuscript you enclosed.

It so happens that we have been long planning to do a SEE IT NOW story on Africa, and we have a camera crew and reporters already at work on the subject.

I do not, however, plan to produce a whole program on Ethiopia. I am returning your manuscript herewith.

Edward Morrow, Esq.,
Colombia Broadcasting System,
485, Madison Avenue,
New York.

Dear Mr. Morrow,

May I introduce myself through our mutual friend, Mr. Ronald Fredenburgh. He suggested that I should write to you on the subject of filming in Ethiopia for television as you might be interested in such a project.

Although Ethiopia came much to the fore during the Italian occupation and the World War it is still comparatively unknown. As I mention in my script it is an ancient kingdom of Coptic Christians with an almost unbroken line of kings descended from Solomon and the Queen of Sheba. It stands there surrounded by primitive tribes, isolated from the neighbouring countries by deserts but with a civilisation of its own untouched, happily, by the more unfortunate aspects of our Western civilisation.

My wife and I visited Ethiopia in 1952 and went down to the least known South Western area where I was in search of orchids (now happily growing at the Royal Botanic Gardens, Kew). We so fell in love with the country and its people that we later decided to make a film of a land little known so that the rest of the world might get to know it better and perhaps visit it and enjoy its beauty. It is just over a year ago that I made up my mind to do this work, deciding to start by filming the South Western area which I knew.

The difficulties proved to be many, the greatest being that of obtaining permission from the Imperial Ethiopian Government to make a film of the country. Up to the present time it has not viewed any such film with favour and has refused several big film organisations the facilities required for this purpose. The only films extant are some war pictures made by the Italians, put together with a few shots in or around Addis Ababa concerning the coronation of the Emperor. However, after many months of endeavour through friends of mine at our Embassy there and in our Foreign Office, I am at last in the happy position of being the first person to have obtained permission to make a film that will take me across the country.

I shall take sufficient material for thirteen half-hour television programmes and in addition make a one-hour documentary film with the working title of "In Search of Queen Sheba's Mines". The expedition will start from Addis Ababa and then go down South West to Jimma, Gore, Dembidollo and Gambeila on the Sudan border. At Dembidollo we will leave the only road and go by mule across country to the twin mountains called Tulu Wallel (Sheba's Breasts) where legend has it the fabulous mines are situated. A legend supported by search at the British Museum and local lore.

On this expedition I will take with me a qualified botanist, one whom, I hope, will be suggested by Sir Edward Salisbury, director of the Royal Botanic Gardens, Kew, who has kindly offered to loan me the equipment for the collection of plants in the area I am visiting. Sir Edward tells me that specimens from this part of the country are practically non-existent in the Kew Herbarium and therefore it will be of great interest to return with a collection of a large number of probably hitherto unknown plants.

I enclose a draft script of the documentary film I shall make together with a budget. I will, of course, have with me professional cameramen/directors used to this kind of work in Africa and the East and the pictures will be made in colour on 35 mm stock. The total cost of the whole expedition, which will take four or five months to complete, will be £20,000 including processing, editing, music, dubbing, etc. in this country, which I believe is more reasonable than is general in the U.S.A.

I am writing to you at some length so that you can have as many details as possible to hand because to make this film it would be necessary to leave London about the middle of December in order to have it completed before the big rains start. If you find this project interesting would your organisation consider sponsoring it to the extent of the sum I have mentioned? I would wish to participate to some extent in the profits and provided these were covered would suggest you have world rights. It would also be essential that my wife and myself appear on television or at least do the commentary as, in my opinion, it is the only way to bring such pictures into the home and make them genuine and alive.

I think I had the pleasure of being in contact with you during the war when you showed interest in a programme I was producing at that time for the B.B.C. called "A.R.P. Quiz" in which wardens of different areas competed in their knowledge of how to deal with various "blitz" incidents. I left the B.B.C. in 1952 before I went to Ethiopia, having worked as a producer on the Corporation staff for some fifteen years and I have since been presenting plays in London and at my theatre at Richmond and the New Lindsey Theatre.

I shall look forward to hearing from you and hope we might do some interesting work together.

Yours sincerely,

Dear Sir:

Five Toledoans named Benarth, Polinski, Riser, Sanzenbacher and Sweitzer, who were discharged by Brotherhood unions and the New York Central Railroad in July 1954, today filed the enclosed appeal to the National Railroad Adjustment Board.

Please, as a believer and upholder of fair play, read at least the red underlined material.

I also enclose a resolution recently adopted by the men themselves in a Toledo lodge belonging to the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers.

I hope you will help in a crusade to drive this form of soviet dictatorship out of America and make unions truly democratic.

Further enquiries will be fully answered and welcomed.

Respectfully,

C. Polinski

To the National Railway Adjustment Board
First Division, Chicago, Ill.

Appeal from decisions of Asst. Gen. Mgr. Peterson at Cleveland, Ohio

Versus

New York Central Railroad
Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Enginemen
Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers

The undersigned under compulsion and involuntarily submit this appeal to the National Railway Adjustment Board of Chicago under protest, and for the sole purpose of protecting their legal rights in the event competent judicial tribunals ultimately decree these plaintiffs must exhaust this administrative remedy before being entitled to judicial relief.

Undersigned specifically deny:

(1) N.R.A.B. jurisdiction (a) to hear this appeal
(b) of the subject matter
(c) to interpret N.R.A.'s statutory provisions particularly the meaning of the words " National in Scope"

(2) the equity and the accuracy of N.R.A.B. award 16475 (as contrary to the evidence) in denying U.R.O.C. is a union national in scope

Undersigned contend:

(1) N.R.A.B. wrongfully ignored U.R.O.C.'s membership of 13316 in 1952 and 6550 in 1953 in 38 and 35 states and despite U.R.O.C.'s membership exceeding that of Switchmans union admitted by N.R.A.B. to be national in scope, discrimately denied recognition of United Railroad Operating Crafts.

(2) Labor union members of NRAB are incapable of rendering a just and equitable decision because they are on the payrolls of the unions whose violations of law are the subjects of this appeal

(3) NRAB attempts to sit as judge of their own employers infringement of applicants rights

(4) Brotherhood unions represented on NRAB have conspired to discipline individual employees they are otherwise unable to coerce, and to destroy and/or prevent the growth of any unions competing with them, all in violation of Railway Labor Act's general purposes (2) and (3)

(5) The effect of Brotherhoods collaboration has been to impose dictatorship upon the formerly economically free United States Railway employees

(6) Brotherhoods seek to enforce their hegemony upon all NYC employees with out prior consideration; voice or vote of the employees as to latters desires either for a union shop, or the unions in question, or the specific agreement

(7) No notice of the existence nor requirements of the May,17, 1951 union shop agreements was ever given by the NYC or the unions

(8) Brotherhoods discriminate between employees, allowing some UROC members to continue employment and reinstating some former Brotherhood members without payment of back dues while others are required to pay

(9) The entire program of the Brotherhood unions, has been designed to enforce upon discharged employees the delay of some eight months for an appeal to NRAB, while their famlies suffer economic privations, before court relief can be sought

(10) Discharge of economically poor individual wage earners by wealthy, powerful Brotherhood unions is the identical form of economic coercion and murder by wealthy employers which the Wagner Labor Act and all other so called labor legislation was designed to prevent

(11) All were discharged by NYCRR in July and September 1954 and have been blackballed or denied applications by BofLE and/or BofLFE.

Wherefor applicants pray for:

(1) decree acknowledgeing NRAB lacks jurisdiction for reasons above to hear this appeal

(2) alternatively, if (1) is denied, decrees:

a. reversing (as contrary to the evidence) award No.16475 denying U.R.O.C. is national in scope

b. finding applicants have complied with Public Law 914 by applying to BofLE and BofLFE and being refused admission

c. requiring NYC to reinstate, as wrongfully discharged, and pay all wages lost from discharge to reinstatment dates

d. finding BofLE and BofLFE have not adequately without discrimination represented nor protected all employees, as they are bound to do upon negosiating union shop contracts, since upon claiming representation, their acts became infected with public interest.

Fifteen copies of each exibit, as you request, will be forwarded within ten days.

Yours truly

Resolution adopted by Division 457 on the "Union Shop Agreement."

Whereas, there is in existence at this time an "Agreement" between some Brotherhood officials and New York Central Railroad officials which was signed May 18, 1951, and which is called a "Union Shop Agreement," and,

Whereas, it was claimed by the officials who advocated and signed the "Agreement" that it would increase our membership, reduce our dues, and strengthen our Union, and

Whereas, this is the situation set before us; but since we are forced, as railroad employees, to deal with this situation as a daily force in our lives, we will have to see this situation in its effect upon us; we must go beyond unsupported predictions and sugar coated pills, and delve into the real facts.

Our position is, that we do not delegate to our officials any blanket power of attorney for us, or the right to make any contract for us except those matters that represent our interest versus Company's. We are organized in the Brotherhood to advance our interest against the Company, not to lose our rights in any other fields.

Now Whereas, (1) This "Agreement" does not improve our conditions versus the Company's, but makes it impossible for us to check irresponsible officials by withdrawing their source of income.

Whereas, (2) Our freedom to pay dues or not pay dues is, in effect, a monthly referendum, and

Whereas, (3) Such a reduction in our control over our officials, further reduces our democratic rights, and

Whereas, (4) The membership had no opportunity to vote on the question, and

Whereas, (5) The Florida land deals, Brotherhood owned non-Union coal mines, Loyality Bonds, and other numerous mistakes and abuses by Brotherhood officials are proof that we need more not less control over them, and

Whereas, (A) Our inability to better our conditions, our failure to gain significant concessions from the employers, such as shorter hours, increased real wages, shift differentials, sick leaves, and many other conditions already obtained by other democratically organized Unions in other industries, and

(B) The court cases pending concerning the dismissals under the "Agreement", which may cost us hundreds of thousands of dollars, prove that these expensive "mistakes" are not ancient history but are still continuing, and

Whereas, the "Agreement has not increased our membership, strengthened the rank and file membership or lowered our dues, but has on the contrary created animosity between fellow workers, and

Whereas, the "Agreement" has not put any money in our pockets. The "Agreement" has enabled the Company to use our own Union to support their constant effort to get rid of employees with gumption enough to fight for better wages and conditions, and

Whereas, the total effect of this "Agreement" on us has been to aid the Company to get rid of good union minded men (the real no-bills are not caught by this means) while at the same time making it safer for some irresponsible or lazy Union officials to play their inter-office politics at our expense and with no effective check by the membership, and

Whereas, the negotiating and signing of such an "Agreement" which is not for the benefit of the membership, is not a part of the rights and duties of our Brotherhood officials, since it is really an agreement for and by the officials alone, and

Whereas, the membership, not the Company or the Brotherhood officials, bears the full burden of the "Agreement."

Therefore, be it resolved,

(1) That we declare this "Agreement" be unauthorized, undemocratic, opposed to true trade union principles.

(2) That no such agreement ever again be signed without membership agreement based on a referendum.

(3) That we instruct our Local Chairman to do all in his power to the end that this "Agreement" be abrogated at the coming General Grievance meeting of the B.L.E. for the New York Central Lines West.

(4) That all subordinate divisions, officers and members on the New York Central System West of Buffalo be made acquainted with this action, and that we urge them to take action instructing their representative to the General Committee to work for the abrogation of said "Agreement", and be it further

Resolved, that a letter be sent to the Assistant General Manager, Labor Relations, New York Central Lines West and the Vice-President, Labor Relations New York Central System, advising them that we are opposed to the "Union Shop Agreement."

Dear Mr. Edward Murrow,

We have recently sold here on behalf of Lenore Coffee (Mrs. William Joyce Cowen) her novel called WEEP NO MORE. It will be published by Cassell. Soon we hope to sell the film rights.

I am enclosing an excerpt from the novel. Mrs. Cowen says she knows that paragraph 2 is a direct quote from one of your wartime broadcasts and that she hopes she may have your permission to use it in her book. She is worried for fear that she may have unconsciously used some of your words in paragraphs one and three for she writes me:-

> "I listened to Mr. Murrow broadcast every day of the entire war and it is quite possible that some of his phrases stayed with me. I'd be very grateful if you would send him this page and if he has the slightest objection to anything in it, I shall do the speeches over".

I should greatly appreciate it if I could hear from you in the near future for you see Cassell are anxious to push on with their production of the novel.

You may remember that we met several times in London during the War.

All good wishes.

Yours sincerely,

Laurence Pollinger

Before Sara could find an answer to this frightening question, the alarm clock rang shrilly. With the automatic movement which comes from habit, Sara swung swiftly in her chair to the radio beside her typewriter and turned it on. Mrs. Bunker recognized the accustomed gesture and returned to the kitchen, while Sarah pushed her chair away a little and leaned back to listen to Mark's voice as it came over the radio. It possessed a kind of youthful gravity which had won him many listeners.

> "This is the Overseas Services of the British broadcasting Corporation. It has been a quiet day in London. Quiet save for the occasional buzz bombs. These missiles have created a new kind of fear. There is no siren -- no warning. If you hear a strike, you know you have not been hit. If you are hit, you hear nothing. Today the damage done was comparatively slight; I walked around the bombed areas and as I did so I remembered the report made by a distinguished American who broadcasts from London. I would like to repeat it to you."

He read quietly, almost conversationally.

> "I went into a shop in Bond Street to buy a hat. A bowler: what we call a derby at home. It is the only hat which does not become sodden with rain. But I felt rather foolish when I tried it on and the proprietor said, 'If you're not certain, sir, come back tomorrow.' 'What if you're not here tomorrow,' I said. I wish I could describe the look which accompanied the reply! 'Of course we shall be here. We've been in business here for a hundred and fifty years.'

Mark paused after this excerpt, then added his own comment, during which his easy tone took on an undercurrent of passionate conviction.

> "But I think the proprietor mistakes what that business is. It is not the dispensing of hats and handkerchiefs over the same counter for a hundred and fifty years. It is the dispensing of courage, common-sense and dignity from one small battered island. That is the business the British are in and have been in for more than nine hundred years!"

Many thanks for your note of August 23rd.

I know Mr. Willett and his associates will be greatly disappointed, but they will certainly understand your position.

Jo and I and the two older girls have just returned from a vacation at Marthas Vineyard. I stopped over at the American Bar meeting, and now I need another vacation.

Dear Judge:

Sorry to have been so long in answering yours of August 1. I have been having a little time off spending most of it bailing hay and wrestling with a bulldozer up at the farm. I come back to the daily grind next Monday.

Sorry, but the answer to Mr. Willett must be no. My schedule this year is going to be the same as last only worse, and I have to choose between doing the best I know how with radio and television and preparing and delivering speeches. I am truly flattered to be asked to talk to such a distinguished group of educators, but I just can't do it.

The small plane accident was interesting; Janet and Casey were both very steady.

Do let us know when you are going to be in New York again and save time to come up to the farm.

Dear Ed:

As you may remember, I am Chairman of the School Board here in Richmond - which, incidentally, is a job not without its problems in view of what the Supreme Court has said the South must do with "all deliberate speed".

The Superintendent of the Richmond Public Schools is Henry I. Willett, a personal friend of mine and also unquestionably one of the leading public school educators in the United States. At the present time he is National President of the American Association of School Administrators. He has recently returned from Geneva where he headed the American delegation to the U. N. sponsored conference on education.

Mr. Willett is planning the program for the National conference of the American Association of School Administrators which will be held in Atlantic City next February 18-23. He is most anxious to have you speak on the program, as he has admired your leadership in educational radio and television for many years.

I have told him of your policy not to speak very often, but I did think this was the type of forum which would particularly appeal to you. As Mr. Willett states, it is the largest educational meeting in the world. I enclose his letter to me of July 27th which indicates he would like to have you on Sunday evening, February 19th, but could fit you in at another time if convenient.

Changing the subject, Jo and I were keenly interested in reading of the narrow escape which you had in the airplane accident. But, as you say, any landing is "beautiful" if you can walk away from it.

We are still hoping to get all three of you down to Virginia. Do call us whenever there is an opportunity.

Sincerely,

Lewis

Dear Lewis:

This letter is a follow-up of our conversation on yesterday when we talked about our plans for trying to secure Mr. Edward R. Murrow as a speaker at the national conference of the American Association of School Administrators in Atlantic City, February 18-23.

At the present time we are holding Sunday evening, February 19th, with the thought that he might be available on Sunday and not on a week day because of his radio and television commitments; however, our program is still flexible enough to schedule him on another evening if he preferred.

As I indicated to you, we would expect to pay expenses plus an honorarium; however, we would like to have some indication from him as to what he would expect if he will be available.

I will give just a few points about the conference: It will be composed primarily of superintendents of schools throughout the United States and Canada; school board members; college presidents; and deans and professors of education. At our last meeting in Atlantic City we had a registration of something over 18,000 people. This meeting is considered to be the largest educational meeting in the world.

We have not decided on a definite theme for the convention, but it will have an international flavor. One of the themes under consideration is EDUCATION - KEY TO A LASTING PEACE. I am confident that Mr. Murrow's presence will be greatly appreciated by the educators of America, and I believe that he could make a wonderful contribution. I hope that the idea will appeal to him.

I am encouraged from the fact that we will have one of his very good friends and such a persuasive intercessor presenting our cause. If you need any other information, please let me know. If you feel that it is desirable to follow up your letter with a telephone call, please keep a record of the cost so that I can reimburse you.

Dear Ed Murrow:

I know this letter is reaching you at a bad time, having only recently returned from England and probably up to your ears with program activities.

However, I'm hoping you might be able to steer me into the right office at CBS. Josephine and I directed and produced four movie shorts in Mexico this winter which we think have TV possibilities.

They range in length from 12 minutes to 50. The latter one tells the story of the bullfight from the raising of the bulls and the training of the bullfighters to the main event at 4 o'clock on a Sunday afternoon. Of course, the actual fight is the least important of the whole sequence as it must be for obvious reasons for an American audience.

We will be in New York - at the Savoy-Plaza - June 7 to 10, after we return from a round visiting colleges with our daughter who thinks she prefers Smith over Mt. Holyoke, but who just might have trouble qualifying for either.

Josephine was sorry Janet couldn't come in to New York when we were there last winter attending the GM Motorama.

If you're too busy, or expect to be out of town, I'd appreciate your alerting your secretary to my CBS mission and she might be able to open the right door for me.

Sincerely yours,

Dear Mr. Murrow,

Ed suggested that I write and make an appointment to speak with you. He indicated that a meeting at your farm in Pawling on a Saturday afternoon might be suitable. This, of course, would be most convenient for me, but you must know that I am ready to come to your office at any time you may choose.

I am looking forward to meeting you. It will be, indeed, a great pleasure.

My dear Murrow,

I have now received from your publishers SEE IT NOW. I am delighted to have it and proud to be in it. There have been times when I have wished TV hadn't been invented, but there won't be any while I am looking at this book. Incidentally, your introduction is a fine bit of prose.

My own TV career continues modestly. I did six experimental halfhour programmes last summer for the B.B.C. which had some success. They want me to do some big hour-long imaginative programmes, but I cannot agree to do them until they can be put into permanent form, to be repeated and sold elsewhere. At my time of life I can't work hard at something that comes and goes in a night, however large the audience. They think telerecording not good enough and cannot afford to put such things on film. (It is not the actual cost of the filming that is the difficulty but the increased fees of everybody concerned - actors, musicians etc.) Meanwhile, on Jan 2nd I begin a fortnightly series of book talks, to try and make TV sell some books. Last September they did an AT HOME (like your Person To Person) programme at my house in the Isle of Wight, and people seemed to like it.

I will ask Harpers to send you a copy of the book my wife and I have written, called Journey Down A Rainbow. There are a lot of potential TV programmes in it, as I am sure you will soon discover. For example, in what I call "Nomadmass" - that terrible world of motels, filling stations, drive-in picture theatres, roadside eating places and bars, which is just the same for three thousand miles. Sometimes I feel we are all busy putting the old-fashioned cosy hell out of business and building a real one here.

All good wishes,

Yours ever,

J. B. Priestley

Just a word of congratulation and encouragement in respect to your presentation of January 4 at which time you interviewed Dr. Robert Oppenheimer. It was indeed a fine effort in which the public was able to be exposed to the manner in which the barriers of science are pushed forward.

Though I was often inclined to do so, I never did get around to saying how grateful I have been for the courage that you displayed during the McCarthy controversy. I congratulate you for it.

Dear Sir:

I just heard your broadcast this evening and your interpretation of the Tito-Soviet meeting in Yugoslavia where you said something to the effect that what happened could not have been predicted nor even dreamed a while ago.

This struck me since it came from somebody whom I consider extremely objective and very well informed. Besides it is one of this country's great pride to have the best possible research available for writers and commentators. We, in Europe, in the same profession were never so well equipped as you are over here.

For the record, as your statement was so categorical I'll have to quote myself, although hating to do it. In January 1954 I published a story written after an extensive investigation in the summer and fall of 1953 in which I said that after Stalin's death Tito was to re-establish his ideological and state relationship with the new set up in the Kremlin - Malenkov at the time. I gave my reason as you will see if you can take some of your precious time to look at it. The story is basically accurate still now lacking some details as it is inevitable in such an endeavor. When the story appeared Tito himself quickly denied it through the AP (the first time Tito ever argued with an exile). His denial, reproduced by all newspapers all over the world, was unconvincing as I stated in my answer also through the AP. After that nothing happened, on the contrary the pro-Tito's policy continued to ride on the crest of the wave until the Soviet brass came to Belgrade.

While - in these last few days - no researcher in this country found this story in his morgue, the European press dug it out and commented it again. The leading Italian newspaper Il Corriere della Sera of May 21 had a very long editorial article stressing the fact that in the US nobody paid any attention to my "indefatigable" efforts to find out the reality.

In history of the ideological struggle the totalitarians always side with their ideological kin, more so the communists. The recent example of Mussolini should not be forgotten. Laval and Chamberlain believed and made concessions to him. Il Duce after a very short neutrality went with Hitler and stabbed France in the back. Tito is inevitably bound to do the same, whether we dream it or not.

Sincerely yours,

Bogdan Raditsa

BOGDAN RADITSA served for many years as a diplomat for the prewar government of Yugoslavia, before becoming Foreign Press Chief for Marshal Tito at the end of World War Two. In that capacity he knew intimately the present leaders of the Yugoslav army and state. He quit Tito in 1946 in protest against Communist terrorism. He is now living in New York and is professor of Modern European History at Fairleigh Dickinson College.

C. DICKERMAN WILLIAMS, as General Counsel of the U.S. Department of Commerce from 1951-53, had ample opportunity to observe the functioning of the Office of the President. His careful scrutiny of it (p. 266) demonstrates its unconstitutional aspects and throws a new light on the maneuvers behind the White case.

WILHELM ROEPKE is well known both as economist and sociologist, and author, among other books, of a monumental trilogy, of which two volumes, Civitas Humana and The Social Crisis of Our Time have appeared in English.

MAX EASTMAN, in his days as a magazine editor, became acquainted with the newspaper magnate, E. W. Scripps, and was sometimes subsequently treated to whole days of the old man's vivid and intellectually lively conversation. On the basis of this personal memoir, he has written a portrait of this little known great man for the FREEMAN.

R. G. WALDECK has sent us another of her "Letters" from foreign capitals, this one from Vienna, interpreting recent political developments.

EUGENE LYONS, editor and journalist, spent six years (1928-34) in Moscow as a correspondent. His studies and writings since that time have won him a high place among our foremost authorities on Communism and Soviet Russia. His books include Assignment in Utopia, The Red Decade, and a biography of Stalin.

ROBERT DONLEVIN, in our issue of September 21, discussed the much-asked question: "Has Russia Got the A-H Bombs?" Since his return from Paris last spring, he has been a frequent contributor to the FREEMAN.

MICHAEL T. FLORINSKY, who is a professor of economics and economic history at Columbia University, has written extensively on the governments and economic systems of contemporary Europe. A review of his most recent work, a two-volume history of Russia, appeared in the FREEMAN of November 16.

J. DONALD ADAMS has, since his college years, spent all the time he could spare from his activities as editor and literary critic to living among the American Indians. He is currently preparing a book to include the fruits of these observations and studies.

Tito's Secret Alliance with Moscow —The Inside Story

By BOGDAN RADITSA

On August 26, 1953, I arrived in Trieste, determined to confirm or refute a sensational series of reports: Was Marshal Tito rejoining the Kremlin? Was Yugoslavia's Communist dictator, in whom the West had invested $500,000,000, conspiring with Moscow to betray the free world?

I had first heard the rumors in America, and I had now spent two months at the long frontiers of Yugoslavia, gathering facts and documents, meeting old friends, interrogating diplomats and intelligence experts. Trieste was the last stop on a long journey. Here, as I waited for the two men from Yugoslavia who would bring me the keys to the puzzle, I reviewed the events which had led me to this rendezvous.

In 1948 Joseph Stalin and his chief aide, Andrei Zhdanov, had read Tito out of the world Communist movement. In desperation, Tito had turned for help to America and England, but called himself a "true" Communist all the while. When Stalin died, things changed in Moscow. Georgi Malenkov—Zhdanov's old enemy—became Soviet Premier. The popular Marshal Zhukov, whom Stalin had banished to a provincial garrison, became Vice-Minister of Defense. Within a few months Stalin's Georgian comrade, the dread police chief Lavrenti Beria, was purged. Malenkov also quickly rewrote the official history of the Soviet Communist Party so that it contained only slight references to Stalin, who had actually made that history for almost thirty years.

As these events unfolded in Moscow, it was only natural for me, as a former colleague of Tito's, to wonder how the Yugoslav dictator would react. I soon found out. On June 14 Soviet Russia and Yugoslavia announced they were resuming diplomatic relations. A few days later, gunboats of the Soviet fleet were traveling down the Danube through Yugoslavia for the first time in five years. Before the summer was over, Kremlin satellites Bulgaria, Hungary, Albania, and Rumania had also decided to resume relations with Tito. Meanwhile, Yugoslav newspapers began to criticize "pro-American influences," and to print sharp attacks on American foreign policy, race relations, labor unions, art, movies, and women.

When factory and mine workers in East Germany and Czechoslovakia, many of them former Communists, revolted against the Kremlin in June, I watched for Tito's reaction. For a while, Belgrade issued noncommittal, ambiguous statements. But careful observers could tell that the Yugoslav Communists were not pleased. Finally, Tito's official biographer and chief propagandist, Vladimir Dedijer, wrote a long article in the Communist organ Borba. He said that the German and Czech uprisings had been "incited" by shady Americans, that they increased the danger of war, and were aimed to restore feudal reactionary classes to power. The Dedijer article was a direct playback of the Moscow line.

By the time this startling comment appeared, I was making investigations along the Yugoslav frontier. It did not surprise me when Tito received the new Soviet Ambassador cordially, or when his Central Committee sent good wishes to the Russian Communist Party on its fiftieth anniversary. Nor was I surprised when Tito told a British newsman that Red China belonged in the United Nations, and that Yugoslavia would "never" join the Atlantic Pact but desired "normal and even, to a certain extent, friendly relations with the U.S.S.R." I no longer doubted that Tito was strongly considering a new alliance with Russia. The real question was: How far had he gone?

Authentic Documents Tell of Pact

The documents that answered that question were brought to me from Belgrade by men whom I knew personally; I can vouch for their unimpeachable integrity and sound political judgment. The documents themselves are the detailed reports of two secret anti-Communists who are high in Tito's regime. One of them is a member of the Central Committee of the Yugoslav Communist Party; the other is a prominent official at the Central Headquarters of U.D.B.A., Tito's secret police. Although each report was written independently of the other, the two tally on all essential points. Other sources confirmed many details in both reports. The authenticity of both documents has been verified to me personally by one of the most respected intelligence services in Europe.

This is the story these documents tell: Tito and Malenkov, after many preliminary overtures, definitely agreed during the middle of July to work toward a resumption of the old Moscow-Belgrade partnership. The numerous frictions which led to the original break are to be eliminated by a joint Yugoslav-Soviet commission. The details of Yugoslavia's future political strategy remain to be worked out, but the present plan calls for concealing the new Tito-Malenkov alliance. Under this scheme Tito will be permitted to make occasional criticisms of Moscow and thus will be able to continue receiving American aid. He can serve Malenkov by disrupting the NATO alliance and by independently playing up to non-Communist radicals in Europe and Asia.

So far as can be determined, the initiative for the new alliance came from Tito, but Moscow was quick to respond. About a month after Stalin's death, a Yugoslav Foreign Office official named Josipovic went to Moscow and attempted to offer Tito's proposals for a rapprochement to top Soviet leaders. Josipovic never got to see the top leaders, but was carefully interviewed by officials of the Soviet Foreign Ministry. Malenkov's response soon followed. Early in May, the Soviet military attaché in Albania came to Belgrade in a Yugoslav train, accompanied by two Russian civilians. He stayed in Belgrade four days in civilian clothes, residing at the headquarters of the Belgrade Municipal Communist Party. After getting in touch with important Yugoslav generals, he went on to Moscow. Later that month, four high officers of the Soviet Communist Party (all specialists in Soviet relations with foreign Communist parties) came to Belgrade and conferred with Tito's Minister of the Interior, Alexander Rankovic.

Negotiations were stalled for several weeks as the workers' revolts in the satellite states shook the Kremlin. But late in June, after Beria had fallen, Tito made a new report to his Politburo on the many feelers that had been put out by him and by the Soviets since Stalin's death. The Politburo urged pressing the negotiations further, and Malenkov was quick to pick up the thread.

On July 4, 1953, Tito was at his summer home in Bled, near Ljubljana, when a special plane arrived at his headquarters from Belgrade. In the plane, bearing urgent news, was Svetozar Vukmanovic-Tempo, a former Partisan general who now bosses Yugoslavia's economy. His arrival prompted hasty conferences in which Tito, Rankovic, Edvard Kardelj, and Milovan Djilas—the top leaders of the government—all took part. Several times in the next three days, Vukmanovic-Tempo flew back and forth between Ljubljana and Belgrade. On July 6, he was in Ljubljana for the last time, dressed in the Partisan uniform which he had not worn for several years, and accompanied by Alexander Knez ("Sava"), a member of a secret branch of the U.D.B.A. who lived in Moscow before the war.

Vukmanovic-Tempo and Knez left by plane for Moscow. They arrived there on July 8 and spent three days conferring with high Soviet officials. They returned to Ljubljana on July 11. The leaders of the Yugoslav Communist Party and Army General Staff met immediately to discuss Vukmanovic-Tempo's report. On July 18, Belgrade announced the lifting of all restrictions on Soviet officials in Yugoslavia; the next day, Moscow lifted the prohibitions on Tito's men in Soviet Russia. It is quite likely that these announcements signaled the formal assent of both parties to the new secret pact, although perhaps the word was passed informally. In any case, a few days later, a special Yugoslav delegation of twelve left for Moscow, to work out with Soviet officials the many details of the new alliance. One member of the delegation has been positively identified as a general who participated in top-secret deliberations on Balkan defense with the General Staffs of Greece and Turkey.

It is easy to understand why the Kremlin wants Tito back: Yugoslavia, whether an open or concealed ally, represents a priceless strategic asset for the Communist movement. Tito can do even more for Malenkov as a secret ally. Through the Balkan Pact with Greece and Turkey, his men can give the Kremlin the military blueprints of the West. Posing as an "independent Communist" or as an "ultra-radical Socialist," Tito has exerted an influence on radicals throughout the world whom the Kremlin could not reach. Milovan Djilas reported to a secret meeting of Yugoslav youth leaders late in July that Malenkov was "highly appreciative" in particular of the way the Titoists had swung so many Asian Socialists toward "neutralism" and anti-Americanism. In addition to these factors, the Soviets doubtless appreciate the psychological boost the return of Tito would provide for other satellite leaders, shaken by revolts since Stalin's death.

Why Tito Is Rejoining the Kremlin

Tito's motives in the new deal are a little harder to understand. Why has he decided to risk a seemingly profitable alliance with the West, to return to the Kremlin which treated him so shabbily five years ago? The reports of our informants indicate three major reasons for Tito's decision:

1. Malenkov is not Stalin. All the Yugoslavs who have written on the Tito-Stalin split have emphasized Stalin's arrogant, overbearing personality; "he treated us like children," is the theme that runs through their discussions of the break. But the same commentators invariably point out that Stalin treated his Russian subordinates in the same way, humiliating Malenkov and Molotov on countless occasions. The strong element of personal rancor in the Moscow-Belgrade break was removed with Stalin's death. (Zhdanov, Tito's other foe, died in 1948.)

Malenkov's policy shifts did the rest. As early as May of this year, members of the Yugoslav Central Committee were informed by the Politburo that Malenkov's policies were considered "new, positive, and constructive." A circular letter laying down that line was issued on June 15 and read in all Communist Party cells and army political committees. Later, Milovan Djilas told high U.D.B.A. officials that Malenkov had praised the Titoists for resisting Stalin's excesses, and for "never betraying the basic principles of Leninism and remaining consistent Communists." At about the same time, at a meeting of the Communist organization of the Yugoslav General Staff, General Otmar Kreacic hailed Malenkov's reversal of old Stalinist policies in the satellite countries.

One of the major points on which Malenkov has reversed Stalin's policies—the Yugoslavs believe—is the Communist strategy toward the Socialist parties. Where Stalin concentrated on attacking the Socialists, Malenkov believes in converting and confusing them. The Yugoslav Communists regarded Stalin's policy as tactically stupid; after their excommunication, they consciously wooed Socialists everywhere. Now, in his July report to U.D.B.A. officials, Djilas said that Malenkov recognized Tito's superior wisdom on this question:

> It is thanks to our policies, not Stalin's, that the Socialist parties of Asia have so strongly resisted the capitalists, especially America, and have been so friendly to the Chinese Communists. . . . We have shown that an independent Communist party like ours can do much more for the cause of world Communism than a satellite party obviously directed by a commission of Russian Communists. Russia now understands this.

2. Tito believes the West cannot win. The Yugoslavs regard the stalemate in Korea, the growth of Red China as a military power, the growing disintegration of France and Italy, the ill feeling between Britain and America as signs that the Western world is undergoing a severe crisis. Yugoslav generals believe that France can never win in Indo-China; talks with leaders of the British Labor Party, Clement Attlee and Aneurin Bevan, have convinced Tito that Britain will not follow Eisenhower in an aggressive, anti-Kremlin policy. After the Korean armistice was signed, a Politburo member told a group of high Army officers:

"The war in Korea has proved that American political leaders and generals are in utter disagreement. . .that America did not dare to use Chiang Kai-shek against the Chinese Communists . . . that America was forced to spend fifteen dollars for every dollar China spent. The war has shown that nothing can be done in Asia without the Soviet Union and China, which are the two main powers in Asia and have the respect of the Asian peoples. From the Communist point of view, the war was harmful because it tended to unify the capitalist powers; for that reason, it was necessary to stop it. The Soviet Union showed great wisdom in the termination of the war."

Even disregarding Tito's dedication to Communist ideals, he has little to gain—in the long run—from his alliance with the West. Should the West come to terms with Malenkov, neither side would be too interested in propping up his regime, either politically or economically. Should there be war, Yugoslavia could not long resist the Soviet Army, and the West would hardly be inclined to restore Tito's dictatorship after "liberation." More likely than either of these eventualities, in Tito's eyes, is a steady growth of Communist power in western Europe, the Middle East, and Asia, which might outflank a Western-oriented Tito and would reduce his bargaining power with both sides.

The Eager Generals

3. Tito's army prefers Soviet Russia. For Yugoslav military men, Communist or non-Communist, Russia has always been the traditional ally. Moreover, a large part of Tito's officer corps was trained in Russia, and views Soviet strategy and tactics as models for modern warfare. Admiration for men like Marshal Zhukov has always been high. The Montenegrin generals are an especially strong pro-Russian element. Both Vukmanovic-Tempo and the head of the Yugoslav General Staff, General Peko Dapchevich, are Montenegrins; both visited the United States this year and came back to Yugoslavia most impressed. Last spring Dapchevich told a meeting of the Communist organization of the General Staff that rabid American capitalists, despite their talk of peace, were ready to unloose a genocidal war against Russia and her satellites at the slightest provocation; in such a war, he said, he could never rally the Yugoslav Army against Russia. Dapchevich went on to criticize American military leaders, contemptuously comparing them to Nazi generals and adding: "The only difference is that Hitler's generals knew how to fight." He pointed to the aid Russia was now giving the satellite armies, and urged a new Yugoslav-Russian alliance.

Dapchevich was not the only military leader offering such counsel. Once Malenkov had made it clear that he was allying himself with Soviet generals like Zhukov, the pro-Russian sentiments of Yugoslav military men were given full rein. Even after Josipovic's mission to Moscow in April seemed to have failed, the generals continued to press Tito for an accord with the Kremlin. When, a little later, the Politburo formally polled the generals on over-all Yugoslav policy, 65 per cent condemned Tito's collaboration with the West, and urged a return to Moscow's fold.

As a matter of fact, the eagerness of the generals was felt to be a handicap by the Yugoslav Communists in the early stages of negotiations with Moscow. Some party leaders even suggested throwing the army off the scent. If Malenkov knew how eager the army was, the party leaders reasoned, he would demand all sorts of internal concessions from Tito's regime and this might eventually lead to outright Soviet control of Yugoslavia. And if Tito refused these concessions and somehow word of the negotiations got out to the West, he and his party leaders might find themselves completely isolated.

No such deception of the Yugoslav generals was necessary. With Beria's defeat both Malenkov and Tito were ready for the final agreement, consummated by Vukmanovic-Tempo in Moscow.

These were the three main reasons for Tito's return to the Kremlin camp. But the signs of the new Moscow-Belgrade alliance were evident in scores of lesser actions reported by our informants. Among these developments are:

Item: Scores of former members of the Yugoslav Communist Party, who sided with Stalin against Tito in 1948, have been released from prison and restored to good jobs.

Item: Former pro-Stalin Yugoslav leaders, who fled for their lives to the Cominform countries in 1948, have now returned to Yugoslavia.

Item: The anti-Tito school which the Kremlin ran in Budapest for five years was disbanded at the end of June.

Item: The flow of anti-Tito propaganda which had been pouring into Yugoslavia from Rumania, Bulgaria, and Hungary has ceased.

Item: The Yugoslav Communist Party has decided to purge some 50,000 members, whom it described in a circular letter at the end of the summer as "vacillating elements who have succumbed to the influences of the West and nourish illusions toward the capitalist countries."

Item: Tito stubbornly refuses to enter NATO and to permit the United States to establish bases in Yugoslavia.

By the time Andrei Vishinsky dined with members of the Yugoslav U.N. delegation in October, the Yugoslav people were convinced that Tito had achieved his goal of rapprochement with Moscow. They felt this despite elaborate precautions taken by Tito's security apparatus to conceal the new link. The change in the atmosphere of Yugoslavia was apparent to all the discerning Yugoslavs to whom I spoke in the course of my two months' investigation. Every one of the Yugoslavs who crossed the Austrian, Greek, or Italian borders to speak with me had the same comment, for example, on Tito's agitation on Trieste: "It is Moscow's work." Even the small group who doubted that Tito has already signed a pact with Moscow have no doubt that he has tried to do so, and say it is only a matter of time before a final agreement is reached.

Many in the West were skeptical in April 1939, when Soviet General Walter G. Krivitsky described the long history of negotiations between Stalin and Hitler, who had seemed mortal foes for many years. This skepticism was dashed on August 23, 1939, when Molotov and Ribbentrop publicly signed the Nazi-Soviet Pact. And, in the present case, Tito and Malenkov are both Communists.

Disorder at the White House

By C. DICKERMAN WILLIAMS

Lack of legal control over the Office of the President has created a "palace" clique whose influence menaces constitutional government.

Those who have served in the executive branch of the government in recent years are only too familiar with a phenomenon which may be the explanation of the Harry Dexter White case. That phenomenon is the enormous growth in the personnel and influence of the Office of the President. The government has become so complex and the demands upon the President so numerous and so varied that he has built up a large personal organization which, because of its constant and ready access to him, has acquired great power. Apparently through their advice the President has been led to adopt positions or courses of action without notice to or approval by the departments lawfully concerned. Undoubtedly this development is to some extent unavoidable, but its inherent evils have been sharply accentuated by the almost complete lack of legal control over the Office. In other words, this swarm of officials operates largely on the loose, without regulation or responsibility, in a way that completely negates the doctrine of a "government of laws and not of men."

It would be comforting to conservatives to be able to think that this state of affairs had disappeared with the advent of the Republicans, but the available evidence is that with minor exceptions the situation persists and may indeed have grown worse, due to President Eisenhower's unfamiliarity with domestic politics. To illustrate the problem, let us recall some of the features of the White case.

According to former President Truman the commission to White was issued in order to avoid endangering investigation of the Silvermaster spy ring. But who told Mr. Truman that such a course of action was necessary or desirable? It is hardly conceivable that he reached such a conclusion unless so advised by one or more of his associates. Yet the evidence so far available does not identify any adviser who took this view. J. Edgar Hoover,

Dear Mr. Murrow:

Thank you for your note of February 2nd, regarding my last visit to New York. It was kind of you to take time to explain why you did not call.

I thought I would let you know that I am planning an extensive film-making, radio-broadcasting tour of Europe and Israel, starting about February 18th. I shall be working in collaboration with Felix Lazarus, one of Canada's top news-documentary camaramen. Perhaps we can be of service to you while we are over there.

We shall be travelling for about three months, with stops at Dusseldorf, Bonn, Paris, Metz, Rome, Israel and the United Kingdom. We shall be carrying both 16 m.m. and 35 m.m. equipment, as well as tape recorders. Incidentally, we shall be in the Holy Land for Easter-Passover.

Should there be anything we can do, please let me know at your convenience. I would be happy to talk to you or one of your staff, should you be interested.

At any rate, I look forward to meeting with you again.

Yours sincerely,

Dear Mr.Murrow:

You may recall having time for a brief chat with me on the subject of television news - documentaries, about two years ago. At the time, I was preparing to start production on a weekly half-hour show, for a Canadian audience. Now, after being on the air for two years, I would welcome the stiumulus of a short interview with you.

I shall be in New York from this Saturday morning, January 8th, until Tuesday morning, January 11th, and if at any time during my stay you could spare me a few minutes, I should be most grateful. I did try to arrange a meeting with you by telephone, while in New York about six months ago, but our schedules did not jibe.

If you could inform me by collect wire what time would be convenient, I should be very glad to arrange my New York schedule around that time. I know that any interview with you would be of great value in my work, and in return perhaps I can offer some useful information about Canadians and current events in Canada.

May I say that your two weekly programs are a great source of inspiration to all of us who hope to make something of television in Canada.

I shall be staying at the Algonquin Hotel in New York. I look forward to hearing from you at your convenience.

Dear Mr. Murrow:

Our children are growing up in an increasingly complex world. Their attitudes to, and judgement of, this world develop in their early years, and are generally based on adult data, picked up casually and, more often than not, misunderstood.

My thought is that a half-hour childrens' TV news program, to be presented daily just before the "childrens' hour" (4:30 to 5:00 PM), covering the main news of the day, and supplying factual and objective background data, would satisfy a crying need. The background data would supply the continuity which is now so badly lacking, and, over a period of time, most regular child viewers would be able to place current events in their proper perspective.

In order to assure relative objectivity, and in view of the fact that the misuse for propaganda purposes of such a program could be so harmful as to make it preferable not having it at all, it may be desirable to interest one of the Foundations in sponsoring it. In any case there is considerable doubt in my mind that such a program could be commercially sponsored.

If this idea is of any interest to you, please let me know, and I will try to work it out in greater detail.

Very sincerely yours,

MEMORANDUM

To: The Honorable John Foster Dulles

From: The American Civil Liberties Union

Re: Passports and Visas

INTRODUCTION

The American Civil Liberties Union herewith submits a memorandum to the Honorable Secretary of State as a basis for discussion on suggested review and improvements in the procedures of the State Department governing passports and visas.

On November 13, 1952, the ACLU wrote to the then Secretary of State, the Honorable Dean Acheson, requesting a personal interview on the question of review of passport procedures. No answer was received to this letter from Secretary Acheson, but the Special Assistant to the Honorable John Foster Dulles, Mr. John W. Hanes, Jr., replied on April 2, 1953, suggesting that the question be discussed with Mrs. Ruth B. Shipley of the Passport Division. A meeting of ACLU representatives was held with Mr. Shipley on April 14, 1954, but the ACLU's suggestions were not accepted. Because of the seriousness of this problem, we are renewing our representations with the Secretary of State.

No formal approach has been made to the Department of State by us on the over-all problem of visas. We have corresponded with the Department from time to time with reference to specific cases where we believed the procedures could be improved.

I. PASSPORTS

In Bauer v. Acheson, 106 F. Supp. 445, a special federal three-judge court held it to be the law that before the State Department could deny or revoke a passport, it would have to advise the person affected of the reasons therefor, grant that person a due process hearing, and utilize clearly defined standards laid down in advance. Shortly thereafter, on September 2, 1952, the State Department issued new regulations in an attempt to comply with this decision (22 C.F.R., Sections 51.135-51.143). These regulations also established a Passport Appeals Board (Sec. 51.13a). That Board was not appointed, however, until December 23, 1953. Its own regulations appeared in the Federal Register on January 9, 1954. The ACLU has endeavored, through its Washington office, to learn the personnel of the Board, but, aside from knowing that its chairman is Assistant Secretary of State Morton, we have been unable to obtain the names from the Department.

In our view, the regulations of the Department and of the Passport Appeals Board do not sufficiently comply with either the letter or the spirit of the Bauer decision for the following reasons. (1) They do not fully guarantee that a person should be notified of the reasons for the denial or revocation of a passport; (2) the hearing does not sufficiently protect the right to confrontation and cross-examination, so essential to a hearing in which the standards of due process must be observed; (3) no standards whatsoever have been laid down for cases not involving alleged Communists or their active sympathizers; and (4) the criteria which are laid down are, in our judgment, improper.

We analyze below the criteria and procedures, then discuss specific illustrative cases which trouble us and finally suggest appropriate remedies.

A. CRITERIA

The criteria set forth govern only cases involving Communists or their active sympathizers. There are no criteria whatsoever set up for persons denied passports for other reasons. Apparently, these cases are still governed by the standard ruled too vague in the Bauer case, that the contemplated travel would be contrary to the best interests of the United States. Thus, the present regulations actually discriminate in favor of alleged Communists and their sympathizers.

We understand that Mrs. Shipley has given as one reason for this differential treatment the fact that the decisions of the Passport Division which have been most frequently attacked have been those involving Communists or their alleged sympathizers. However, it seems to us that the State Department should insure fairness and equal treatment for all persons, irrespective of the degree or absence of public comment that may have been raised with respect to one group of individuals. The second reason she assigned is that the non-Communist cases are simple to decide and that the Passport Division does not need such procedures in order to arrive at a fair determination. Here too, it seems to us that the issue is not whether the Passport Division can make its decision easily, but the issue of whether the procedures utilized accord with the due process of law required by the Fifth Amendment to the U. S. Constitution. We do not believe that the State Department should be interested only in protecting the procedural rights of Communists and their sympathizers and refuse to grant the same rights to those denied passports for much less heinous reasons. Our comment is based not on the belief that the intent of the Department is to favor Communists, but to emphasize the lack of equal treatment in the present practices. The importance of equal treatment was emphasized by the court in the Bauer case, in which it held that the regulation of passports must be applied "equally to all citizens without discrimination."

We suggest, therefore, that the files of the Department should be studied to determine the criteria that have been utilized in the past as a basis for denial of a passport, in order to formulate clearly-defined criteria which should be set forth in regulations. The State Department has previously informally advised us of the use of the following unpublished criteria, which should be included in regulations if the said criteria are to be used: a) that the applicant was endeavoring to evade justice, or to depart from the United States in contravention of a court order or decree; b) that the applicant was a known criminal who operated in foreign countries; c) that the applicant was mentally or physically ill, and unable to travel alone,* and d) that the applicant was a political adventurer who desired "to go abroad to take part in the political or military affairs of a foreign country in ways which would be contrary to the policy, or inimical to the welfare of the United States." e) passports have been refused to "persons whose past actions raised doubts as to their loyalty," and f) to those "whose habitual practices are such as to bring discredit upon America and things American." Of these standards, a), b) and c) would seem to be sufficiently clear, while e) seems to be further defined in the present regulations. It seems to us that d) and f), however, are still too vague in failing to spell out what is contrary to our interests and what the "habitual practice(s)" may be.

With respect to the present operating criteria, we believe that they are vague and improper.

1. Vagueness. The purpose of the new regulations is set forth in Section 51.135 as being the promotion of the national interest "by assuring that persons who support the world Communist movement...may not, through the use of United States passports, further the purposes of that movement...." Persons supporting the world Communist movement are defined as persons who either

> "(a)...are members of the Communist Party or who have recently terminated their membership under such circumstances as to warrant the conclusion -- not otherwise rebutted by the evidence -- that they continue to act in furtherance of the interests and under the discipline of the Communist Party; (b) persons, regardless of the formal state of their affiliation with the Communist Party, who engage in activities which support the Communist movement under such circumstances as to warrant the conclusion -- not otherwise rebutted by the evidence -- that they have engaged in such activities as a result of direction, domination, or control exercised over them by the Communist movement; (c) persons, regardless of the formal state of their affiliation with the Communist Party, as to whom there is reason to believe, on the balance of all the evidence, that they are going abroad to engage in activities which will advance the Communist movement for the purpose, knowingly and willfully, of advancing that movement."

Under Section 51.141(b), consistent and prolonged adherence to the Party line through shifts and changes thereof, will suffice, prima facie, to support a finding under Section 51.135(b) above. Thus, either consistent following of the Party line through its twists and turns, or membership or activities in behalf of the Communist-front organization under Section 51.135(b), apparently is enough to warrant denial

The new criteria are hardly clear, for the circumstances under which the conclusions may result in denial of a passport may be inferred, but are not spelled out.

2. Improper Standards. Under the terms of these regulations, it is quite clear that passports are being denied on the basis of improper standards. Even those who are going abroad to engage in nothing more than speech which would be permissible in the U.S. may be denied passports (under the broad language of Section 51.135(c)) if that speech is knowingly to advance the cause of the Communist movement.

Under Section 51.142, at any stage of the proceedings, the applicant may be required to swear that he is not nor has ever been a member of the Communist Party. He will be immediately refused a passport if he states that he is presently a Communist. Again, whatever the purpose of the trip abroad may be, however innocuous, every citizen who is a Communist must remain within the United States. It is strange indeed that in an effort to combat Communist totalitarianism we ourselves have adopted the tactics so well known behind the Iron Curtain where passports are refused to those hostile to the Communist regime. Communism can best be fought by showing that the travel abroad of individuals is not feared solely because they are Communists. Should there be ground to believe that the purpose of the trip abroad is to engage in criminal "conspiratorial" activity against the peace and security of our country, then of course refusal of the passport would be justified. The present definition results in the drawing of an Iron Curtain by our own State Department without contributing any safeguards to our own security. It would also seem that denial of a passport to a member of the Communist Party solely because of such membership is precluded at this time by the 1950 McCarran Act. Section 6(a) of the Internal Security Act of 1950 (50 U.S.C. 785) prohibits a member of a communist organization against which there is a final order of the Subversive Activities Control Board requiring registration to apply for or use a passport. Section 6(b) makes it unlawful for any officer or employee of the United States knowingly to issue a passport to such a person.

Section 14(b) expressly defines that a Board order shall become final only upon the conclusion of judicial review. Congress did not change these provisions when it amended the Act in other respects in the Communist Control Act of August 24, 1954 (Public Law No. 637, ch.886, 83rd Cong., 2nd Sess. 16 U.S.Cong. News '54 - p.5153). Therefore the State Department has anticipated by several years the conclusion of the litigation now in the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia involving registration of the Communist Party. If it were not for the very specific statutory provisions the State Department would have a better argument that under its general control of passports it may refuse a passport to any present communist, regardless of the purpose of his trip. But in view of the fact that the statute gives less authority it would seem by implication that the regulation has, at best, dubious validity.

The ACLU has taken the position that criticisms which constitutional guarantees permit within the United States should be permitted abroad, but no such assurance of freedom of speech is given by these regulations. The ACLU recognizes that if the State Department has sufficient evidence to insure belief that the passport will not be used merely for exercising free speech, but, instead or in addition, for the purpose of engaging in conspiratorial activities against the peace and security of the United States, a passport may properly be denied. But these regulations make no provision whatsoever for the exercise of the right of free speech abroad.

B. PROCEDURES

Notice of Tentative Refusal.

1. The person whose passport is tentatively disapproved, under the standards set forth above, is to receive a notice (there is no time limit as to the speed with which this must be sent) of the tentative refusal and of the added "reasons on which the decision is based as specifically as within the judgment of the Department of State security limitations permit." No standard whatsoever is laid down pursuant to which the Department of State is to exercise this judgment, nor are we given any information as to the particular security limitations involved. It may well be that under this regulation the Department will refuse to divulge the ground on which it withholds the passport if divulgence might mean the disclosure of the name of the informants, whether or not he is a counter-espionage agent or the like. If such is the case, there would be many phases in which the protection of these regulations would be wholly illusory.

Hearing and Decision.

2. Before the refusal becomes final, the applicant is entitled to present his case informally to the Passport Division, with counsel, before a hearing officer, reducing the statements to writing in the form of an affidavit. This in essence formalizes the procedure which has been in use for several years, though applicants have not always been aware of this possible relief. The Passport Division is thereupon to review the record, and after due consultation, advise the applicant of the decision. If adverse, it is to be in writing "and shall state the reasons on which the decision is based as specifically as within the judgment of the Department of State security limitations permit."

Appeal

3. In the event of an adverse decision by the Passport Division, Section 51.138 provides for an appeal to the Board of Passport Appeals, set up under Section 51.139 as a Board composed of not more than three officers of the Department to be designated by the Secretary of State. It has adopted and made public its own rules and procedures. There is no provision in so many words to give the applicant the right to confront and cross-examine the witnesses whose statements have resulted in the adverse findings of the Passport Division. While this section does provide that the applicant and each witness can inspect the transcript of his own testimony, apparently the applicant has no right to inspect the testimony of a witness -- a procedure wholly novel as far as the knowledge of the Union is concerned, and certainly unfair.

Revocation of Passports.

4. Perhaps the most serious defect of the procedures is that not only do they fail to make provision for the reasonable and fair convenience of the person whose passport is revoked who lives a great distance from Washington, but there are no regulations whatsoever governing revocation cases, even though the Bauer case, which forced the issuance of the regulations, was a passport case. Persons whose passports have been revoked while, for example, they are travelling in France, Japan, or Africa, would find that remedies available only in the Capitol are somewhat illusory, as would those who live in California and cannot afford a trip to Washington. Consulates abroad should be authorized to hold hearings for those Americans whose passports have been revoked while abroad, with the transcript of the hearing to be forwarded to the Passport Appeal Board, and the traveller entitled to a new hearing upon his return to the United States; and panels (of distinguished citizens) should be appointed in the major population areas to sit as hearing panels of the Passport Appeal Board with the applicant to have the alternative of an appeal to the Passport Appeal Board in Washington in person or on the basis of the written record.

Delays.

5. The question of delays is also important. If speedy (but thorough) investigations and decisions are not forthcoming, the whole value of the hearing procedures may be lost, for the purpose of the trip abroad might not be served at a later date, or the trip might be impossible or inconvenient at a later date. Some sort of a priority system should be set up to insure that applications for passports will be completely processed in advance of the scheduled departure date.

Final Disposition.

6. Under Section 51.140, the Board must advise the Secretary of State of the action it finds appropriate or necessary, and the regulations indicate that the Secretary of State is the one who finally makes the disposition of the case.

Cross-examination.

7. There is an apparent contradiction between Section 51.141 of the State Department regulations and Section 51.170 of the Board regulations. Under the Department regulations, the Board, in making its findings of fact, is required to "be convinced by a preponderance of the evidence, as would a trial court in a civil case." Since a trial court in a civil case would not consider testimony which has not been subjected to the test of cross-examination, evidence the nature or source of which is not disclosed to the appellant and made available to cross-examination could not be considered by either the Passport Division, the Board of Passport Appeal, or the Secretary of State. However, the Board regulations provide that the Board may consider "such confidential information as it may have in its possession." This is entirely inconsistent with the aforesaid State Department regulations. In view of the decision in the Bauer case which indicated that cross-examination in passport cases is a sine qua non, consideration of evidence not subjected to cross-examination might well be considered to be a violation of due process of law, not only for failure to follow the State Department rules, but also as a denial of constitutional due process required by the Fifth Amendment.

C. ILLUSTRATIVE CASES

1. I. Milton Sacks:

a. Delay. From October 8, 1952, to April 29, 1954, Mr. Sacks was unable to obtain a written statement of the grounds upon which adverse action had been taken on his request for a passport. Sacks did not receive a specification of the charges against him until May 27, 1954. On June 28, 1954, he asked for a hearing. As of October 30, 1954, he had received no reply. His passport had meanwhile expired.

b. Standards. Mr. Sacks was advised under date of April 29, 1954, by Mrs. Shipley, that his case did not fall within the scope of Section 51.135 "but was merely a decision that it was not advisable for you to travel to that area and the action was taken under the broad discretionary authority given to the Secretary of State in Section 51.75, Title 22, Code of Federal Regulations." The latter is the broad section giving the State Department discretionary power to deny passports where travel of the applicant is not in the best interest of the United States -- a standard which was held too vague in the Bauer case. Thus, it appears that the Department is continuing to operate under a standard held too vague by a court of law in a case from which it did not appeal.

2. Max Shachtman:

Max Shachtman has been denied a passport solely on the grounds of his active officership in the Independent Socialist League, which has been listed by the Attorney General as a Communist and subversive organization, but which has not yet been granted a hearing by the Attorney General. However, since the organization is violently anti-Stalinist, it would not seem to fit within the criteria set forth in the 1952 regulations. Denial of the passport was thus apparently due entirely to his being head of an anti-Stalinist organization, a matter which is nowhere dealt with in the regulations.

a. Absence of Criteria. Thus, action has been taken again without any criteria set forth.

b. Discrimination in Favor of Communists. Shachtman was denied a hearing on the ground that he did not fit within those criteria set forth for a hearing, i.e, that he is not a Stalinist. This is a prime example of how the present procedures discriminate against persons who are not alleged Communists. It is also a prime example of how the procedures violate due process of law.

3. Mrs. A. B.*:

Mrs. A. B. wishes to visit her son and daughter-in-law in Poland, the latter being very sick and needing nursing care. The children were probably Communists; the son may have renounced Communism already; she hopes to persuade them to give up Communism and return to America. She waived the protection of the U. S. government abroad, in order to relieve the government from such responsibility. The

* We do not list her name here for, since this memorandum may be available to the public, there would be a substantial risk of Mrs. A. B. vanishing behind the Iron Curtain if the Communist Party learned of her identity. We furnish her name, however, in the covering letter to you, in confidence.

law provides merely that it is illegal to leave and enter the country without a passport; she has asked merely for a passport to go to England; from there she can go on herself to Poland if she can do so without an American passport. She has duly stated her intentions to the government.

a. Delay. Mrs. A. B. made her passport application on January 8, 1954. No reply was received from the State Department until May 5, 1954, despite her explanations of the urgency of the situation in view of the severe illness of her daughter.

b. Standards. The Department refused to issue the passport because of the "impossibility of granting protection to American citizens" in Poland, holding further, that she could not relieve the Department of responsibility for her protection. We know of no law or requirement which prevents an American citizen from waiving his right to protection abroad, when she is willing to take the risk thereof and when the security of the United States in not endangered.

4. George W. Shephard, Jr.:

Mr. Shephard has been denied a passport to go to Africa for the purpose of engaging as a private citizen in an agrarian program to assist the farmers of British-controlled Uganda, on the ground that his activities involve "participation in political affairs in foreign countries, inconsistent with the duty of American citizens to avoid such participation." The British government has raised no objections to his return to Uganda, according to a statement made in Parliament on December 16, 1953, by the Secretary of State for the Colonies.

a. Standards. There is no standard laid down in any published rule or regulation denying the right to go abroad because of engaging in political affairs in foreign countries. Any such requirement would seem unreasonable at least when the foreign government makes no objection. Hardly a day goes by when someone in Washington does not state something about political affairs abroad. For example, the Secretary of State and the President, as well as many private citizens, have expressed keen satisfaction at the recent revolution in Guatemala. If it is legitimate to take actions or make statements which have an effect upon politics abroad, we see no reason whatsoever for any private citizen being denied a passport to engage in similar lawful activities while abroad.

5. Dr. Martin Kamen:

Dr. Kamen was denied a passport pursuant to a letter from the Passport Division dated December 21, 1953, on grounds of Communist associations and having furnished certain classified information to Soviet officials. A hearing was held before the Passport Appeals Board. However, no evidence in support of the charges against Dr. Kamen was introduced at that hearing, nor was Dr. Kamen or his attorney given any opportunity to confront his accusers, whoever they may have been.

a. Procedures. The denial of a passport to Dr. Kamen was thus based upon a hearing which did not give the applicant an opportunity to defend himself through cross-examination of his accusers. Moreover, to rule against him when no evidence whatsoever was introduced against him seems to be violative of Section 51.141 of the State Department regulations, for no trial court in a civil case could ever award judgment against a defendant when no evidence whatsoever is introduced against him. It is also violative of due process of law in our opinion. (The ACLU, of course, takes no position on whether or not the accusations against Dr. Kamen are accurate.)

II. VISAS

The American Civil Liberties Union concurs with the editorial, "Freedom of Travel," published in the New York Times of October 22, 1951, which said:

> "Understandably in the present period of great international tension a policy of complete liberality in this area may be impossible. Yet already the denial of visas to distinguished foreigners and the refusal of passports to some Americans have provided fine ammunition for hostile propaganda. It has permitted the Soviet Union, for example, to pose as the friend of exchange of persons and to depict us as the enemy of such exchange. Surely it is time for our administrators and legislators to take another look at the gains and losses of present law and policy. Such a re-examination might well find that greater liberality could be permitted without peril to the national security or interest."

We believe that if civil liberties are to be preserved at home and America's reputation for freedom is to be preserved abroad, both clear and reasonable criteria must be laid down and appropriate procedures established in the issuance of visas. At the present time, immigration visas have been denied for reasons bordering on the ridiculous, or on secret grounds, and procedures for full review of the denial of visas are completely absent.

A. CRITERIA

The Immigration and Nationality Act of 1952 bars from entry to the United States, whether permanent or temporary, all persons who at any time have been members of any Communist Party or its affiliates, etc., unless, for at least five years, the person has been actively opposed to Communism and the admission of the alien would be in the public interest. We recognize that the State Department must necessarily enforce the law, and we can hardly criticize enforcement of laws as they are written.

B. PROCEDURES

1. Failure to provide a hearing. From 1893 until 1941 an alien wishing to enter our borders for permanent residence was entitled to a hearing when denied entry. However, today, aliens are not entitled to such a hearing under law, and may be excluded merely on the ground that "entry would be prejudicial to the interests of the U.S." The Attorney General is authorized under the regulations issued by the Secretary of State, with the concurrence of the Attorney General, to deny hearings when a person is excludable on the basis of information of a confidential nature "the disclosure of which would be prejudicial to the public interest." While this regulation, pursuant to a Presidential proclamation, was originally intended only to have limited emergency application -- only a negligible number of aliens were excluded without a hearing during the war years -- the latest available figures show that from December 1948 to July 1952, "approximately 2,000 aliens other than seamen were temporarily excluded without a hearing, and in about 500 cases the exclusion without a hearing was made permanent."* We believe that the regulations should be changed to grant hearings, with notification of charges in as much detail as security considerations permit.

The federal government's Personnel Security Program, under Executive Order 10450, proceeds almost entirely on the basis of information of a confidential nature. However, except in the rarest cases, this has not prevented the government from disclosing the charges completely; in only a negligible number of cases has the government withheld any of the charges. The present visa regulations apparently confuse the granting of notice of charges with disclosure of sources of confidential information. Years of experience in the Federal Loyalty and Security Programs have shown that charges can be disclosed without compromising the confidential nature of the sources of information. Therefore, at the very least, the charges should be disclosed in so far as security considerations permit -- the same test as used under E. O. 10450. We believe that the government, prior to a hearing, should go one step further and subject informants to cross-examination when they are not counter-espionage agents and the like, but are merely casual informants, whose capacity for accuracy and whose motives for telling the truth may be open to question. And, at the hearing, persons who cannot be cross-examined, because of national security, by the alien himself or by his counsel, should nonetheless be cross-examined by the appropriate hearing officer.

The U. S. Supreme Court has held that an alien may constitutionally be excluded without a hearing (Knauff v. Shaughnessy, 338 U.S. 537). But another test case may shortly be brought by the ACLU in the courts to determine whether the constitutional right of an American citizen is not denied when his alien spouse is excluded without a hearing -- the case of Dr. Alfred Copley, an American citizen who married a woman from Iceland. She has been excluded from the U.S. without a hearing, apparently because it is thought that she may have had some Communist associations. However, she is publicly known to be a non-Communist in Iceland: both its Foreign Minister (Mr. Benediktsson) and its Ambassador to NATO (Mr. Hans Andersen) have reportedly vouched for her. All of her American husband's efforts to get a statement in writing as to the reasons for the denial of the visa have been completely unavailing. An American citizen has a right to his wife's company; to prevent her from entering the country without a hearing is in violation of the husband's right not to be denied liberty and property without due process of law. We believe that Mrs. Copley must be advised of all the charges against her and have an opportunity to defend herself against those charges at a hearing where the rules of due process are observed. If Dr. Copley's wife is not granted an administrative hearing, then a court test will be instituted.

With respect to the site of the hearing, we suggest that it should either be held by the consulate abroad, with a supplementary hearing, if necessary, at an appropriate city within the United States at the port of entry. The hearing should be conducted by a person who is not responsible for enforcement of the law, to avoid a conflict of interest.

2. Lack of Review Procedures. We recognize that under the immigration law, the Department of State has no formal authority to reverse the decision of its consular official abroad. While on occasion the Department will review a decision, we recognize that its function, at least in form, is advisory under the present law. We believe, however, that the Department should (1) seek a change in the law, and (2) set up and establish formal review procedures for the rendering of advisory opinions pending the granting by Congress of the authority to reverse the decision of the consular official. The present haphazard method of review, generally available only to those who press for it or who have influential backing, should be replaced by formal procedure with publicly announced regulations. We know that the Presidential Commission referred to above suggested that Congress should authorize a Board of Immigration and Visa Appeals to review decisions of consular officials, which would have final authority. But we see no reason why the State Department cannot now set up such an appropriate board to render advisory opinions.

3. Delays. The reputation of the United States abroad for fair play has been severely hurt by delays in granting visas for professional and scientific persons invited to the United States by universities or other institutions. We concur with the recommendation of the President's Commission that binding commitments in advance be granted by the Department that a particular scientist or professor will be issued a visa on application, where all the facts are disclosed. Embarrassment can thus be avoided to the individual and the prestige of the United States greatly enhanced. An alternative solution is to give priorities to requests for visas in such instances.

4. Lack of Standards. The exclusion of persons merely on the ground that their entry would be prejudicial to the interests of the United States seems to us to be arbitrary, for there are no regulations set forth (so far as we are aware) governing the application of that standard. There previously have been attempts to spell out standards in prior regulations no longer in effect. The use of such a general and vague standard gives free reign to consular officials abroad to make arbitrary decisions. The implementing regulations should spell out in precisely what instances an entry would be "prejudicial to the best interests of the U.S." It should be limited to the prejudice to our security interests, and the precise bounds and size of this standard should be delineated.

5. Responsibility of the Attorney General. We are deeply concerned with the apparently unwarranted exclusions of individuals by the Attorney General of temporary visitors, the lengthy delays in granting temporary visas, etc. We will take these matters up separately with the Attorney General, as well as the problem mention in B. 1 above, in which the Attorney General shares joint responsibility with the State Department.

The white, shining hope that America presents to the world is that it is a country of free men which respects and lives under due process of law, and in which the individual's rights and dignity are treated with the most scrupulous care. For the sake of our own conscience and our own freedom, there must be no departure from these traditional standards in the battle against Communism. This stand is based not only on doing things, as President Eisenhower has often said, because "they are right," but as a practical, realistic weapon against Communist totalitarianism. To discard or weaken the principles of democracy, such as due process, gives direct aid and comfort to the Communist conspiracy, for it is thus able to argue -- and argue validly -- that we do not practice the freedom that we preach. Democracy weakens itself before the millions of people throughout the world who are weighing the problems of the democratic and totalitarian systems when they become careless of individuals and their rights.

In the twin areas of passports and visas, where everything that is done has enormous repercussions abroad, the battle against totalitarianism makes it even more necessary that the State Department -- the guiding hand of foreign policy -- exercise the utmost care to protect individual rights. It does not matter that our Supreme Court has held that the area of foreign affairs is one which is left pretty much solely to the discretion of the executive without judicial restrictions of due process. The conduct of foreign affairs requires the observance of that due process in order to keep our concept of freedom and decency as a living, thriving ideal, and to defeat the Soviet conspiracy.

Most, if indeed not all, of our comments can be subsumed under the rubric of the predominant need for the rule of law in this as in all other fields. There is a persuasive parallel with the growing demand, voiced by conservatives and liberals alike, for the subjection of the procedures of congressional investigating committees to the principle of rules applicable to all. The individual -- even the alien coming to our shores as immigrant or visitor -- is entitled to know what the rules are under which the government acts in the determination and limitation of his rights and legitimate interests.

Dear Edward:

My wife and I heard you on your fine program on the Vice Presidents.

I think that the program gave your many viewers a new concept of the Vice-Presidency, especially at this time.

You may recall that you and I discussed your program in my room at a motel at Gatlinberg, Tennessee in November, 1951 during the Governors" conference. As I recall, Charles Collingwood and his wife and Virginia Warren, Governor Kohler and his wife and many others were present. It has pleased me in the meantime to see how well the program has worked out.

Sincerely,

Harper's told me that they forwarded proofs of a new book of mine, HEADQUARTERS, to be published in April, to you. This is a book on the New York Police Force, done in cooperation with and vetted by Police Commissioner Adams. I have already sold it to Zanuck for a movie. Received Sometime, if you're on a slow train to Pawling and have a chance to skim through it and if you like it, you might drop me a note. Harper's would like to use some such quote in promotion.

I have a suggestion for one of your Person-to-Person shows. After seeing them both, I would suggest you put Doctor Oppenheimer and Toots Shor on together. Now there would be a parlay.

The entire membership will always be grateful for your contribution to the largest project the Louisville Jaycees have been privileged to sponsor. The Junior Chamber gained statue by our banquet and you can feel proud that you played such an important part in its' success.

The ease you have with people and situations makes you very worthy of the Colonelcy you received, and the people of Louisville are proud that you were able to fit into our scheme of life without missing a puff of your cigarette. Thoughts are that Camels would be a good sponsor for your programs in the future rather than FORD.

Again, thank you, and we hope that you will again visit Louisville, very soon.

Gratefully,

Dear Dorsey:

Thanks for your note of November 22nd enclosing the letter from Edward Burr and the script for "We Did It Ourselves" or "Message of America".

I wish very much that I could find the time to do the narration as suggested, but unfortunately I am already about three weeks behind in my recording schedule and must therefore decide against trying to do this.

Sincerely,

Mr. Dorsey Richardson, Vice President

New York, New York

Dear Dorsey:

A great many months ago in one of our conversations you mentioned, I believe, that you were acquainted with Edward R. Murrow and have an opportunity to see him from time to time in fulfilling your function as a director of CBS.

We have, as you know, just about completed the mechanical work of producing a public service motion picture in cooperation with the U.S. Treasury Department and the U.S. Department of Justice. We hope to release the film in the latter part of December or early January, 1956, for broadcast by the nation's television stations.

Thus far, no arrangements have been made for a narrator and it occured to us that Mr. Murrow might be able, so far as his contract is concerned, and personally willing to consider acting as narrator. I wonder if you would be willing to pass this letter along to him together with the enclosed copy of the script so that he might give it his thoughtful consideration.

Very best wishes.

Cordially yours,

Edward B. Burr

Any of you who've been abroad know that the American dollar is the best money there is, and it's this good money flowing through our economy that makes for our prosperity. Why do we have this good money? Well, partly it's a great tradition. The people who founded the country believed in sound money. Washington and Hamilton followed policies so that they would establish our money as the best money there was, policies with respect to the budget, with respect to the banking system and the management of the public debt.

(BURGESS SOF CONTINUED)

Those traditions have carried on down the years; of course, sometimes we've made mistakes, but on the whole our policies have been sound and they have given us the best money in the world.

2½	63. Dissolve to worker	Ben Oberg...machinist.
5½	64. Cut to engineer and oilman	Engineers and oilmen.
12	65. Dissolve back to Boyd in car pulling up to curb. Out of car to sidewalk	In all walks of life we find people who have set aside part of their savings for investments...to pour money into the life stream of the country.
12	66. Cut to LS, Boyd entering door	John Boyd has a full time job in a manufacturing plant. Like a million other investors he has neither the time nor the training to manage his own securities...a full time job in itself. So, like a million others, John puts his money into investment company shares.
10½	67. Cut to interior of broker's office. Boyd & broker to desk to sit & talk.
4	68. Cut to CU of same	There are two types of investment companies...the closed end company, and the open-end or mutual fund. Each provides two basic, essential ingredients of any investing program... Diversification... and professional management.

5	71. Wipe back to broker	Alone, John can't afford to buy a wide selection of individual stocks.
10	72. Cut to LS as men shake hands and Boyd exits	And the huge task of managing his investments he leaves to the trained experts. And so John is feeding the country's life stream.
5½	73. Fade to LS, building construction	Now, let's return to Gus Johnson. We left him as he was about to take the oath of United States citizenship.

5	78. Dissolve to exterior of house	From immigrant to investor in seven years.
16	79. Cut to interior, Gus coming down stairs. Walks to living room wall mirror. Adjusts tie. Wife fixes collar and hands him letter. He opens it & withdraws certificate	And today, citizenship. Nothing from a silver platter..ever. Gus worked hard for his job and for his citizenship. And he knows he'll have to keep on working hard... just as he did for his house, his car and this..his first share of investment company stock.
4	80. Cut to MCU certificate

28	81. Cut to MLS, Gus & wife smile, wife exits. Cut to LS, wife enters with coat & hat. Gus enters, is helped on with coat. Cut to MLS, same. Gus faces wife then kisses her goodby.	But that's just the way Gus Johnson wants it. He wouldn't have it otherwise, and neither would his wife, Jean. Both of them know first-hand their opportunities. And
	Gus hands wife stock certificate, then walks out of door.	from this day on ...even more opportunities. Yes, Jean, take good care of that stock certificate. It's part of your future too.
3	82. Fade in on LS, Polo Grounds with crowd	And because that investment company share
3	83. Cut to LS, different angle of crowd	means money in the life stream of the country...
4	84. Cut to LS, color guard	it is part of their future, too.
5	85. Cut to MS, Gus raising hand to take oath	And certainly part of yours, Gus.
6½	86. Cut to LS, pan over crowd	In fact, part of all of our futures.
16	87. Cut to Gus finishing oath. He drops hand and camera pans down to CU as Gus shakes with woman next to him. Pans back up to Gus as he looks at flag	And like all of us, Gus, you have a faith in America...a faith that won't fade. We're all part of a great nation, and every one of us has the right and the duty to share in that greatness.

New York, New York

Dear Mr. Murrow:

The most important recommendation President Eisenhower made to us ten days ago during our visit to The White House was in regard to Television and Radio.

The President strongly urged that we expand our educational campaign by participating in more Television and Radio forums; that we bring the vital meaning of international trade to the public by means of these essential media. He made it clear that he, himself, follows these discussion programs closely and considers them a real factor in the development of public opinion. In our 35-minute-long conference at The White House, The President warmly endorsed our work to date, but, in developing strategy, again and again, returned to the theme of TV and Radio appearances.

The Committee is, of course, only too willing to join in forum and other types of educational broadcasts. We have already had the fortune of doing some amount of work in these fields. But, of course, real fulfillment of the Executive suggestion depends on you.

This bipartisan, 100% volunteer organization has been campaigning for slightly more than one year. In that time we have grown from a small nucleus made up of leaders of both the Young Republican and Young Democratic Clubs of New York City, to an organization of over 700 in the city, with growing chapters in New Orleans and Washington, D. C.

Popular interest in and support for a liberalized tariff-trade program must be developed. In the absence of that public awareness, the field is given by default to the High Tariff Lobbies, thereby not only jeopardizing the continuing expansion of the U. S. economy, but gravely threatening the success of U. S. foreign policy. The Committee has campaigned from its inception to fill that vacuum - to bring the Average Man into the debate on the crucial trade issue. But we completely agree with The President that a tremendous amount of work remains. We believe that our purpose, public education, is a matter that must be of real concern to you, too.

Right now the fight on tariffs is in the forefront of the news - and it will remain there for the next three or four months. Its importance cannot be overly stressed: as The President has said: "If we fail in our trade policy, we may fail in all." The Committee on Foreign Trade Education, Inc., by its aggressive campaign and by its lack of self-serving interest, has won real recognition. We know that we will make a very significant contribution to any program in which you present the trade issue. We look forward to the opportunity of cooperating with you in preparing and participating in such broadcasts.

Very sincerely yours,

TRADE GROUP TALKS WITH IKE

Offers to Help Him Toward Passage of Kean's Low Tariff Bill

WASHINGTON (AP)—President Eisenhower yesterday discussed with a delegation from the Committee on Foreign Trade Education ways to stimulate public interest in his program to increase foreign trade through lowering tariff barriers. The group, from the New York-New Jersey area, was accompanied by Representative Kean (R-12th Dist. NJ), sponsor of a bill to carry out the President's foreign trade recommendations.

B. A. Rittersporn Jr. of New York said the group, a national bipartisan organization of young people endorsing the President's program, sought and received Eisenhower's advice on what they can do to mobilize support for it.

He said the President told them to step up the use of speakers before various organizations and try to get more of their members on television forum discussions.

"He sees the need of intensive public support for this program as part of our foreign policy," Rittersporn said.

Eisenhower In 2-Party Trade Talks

Discusses Tactics On Foreign Plans

From the Herald Tribune Bureau

WASHINGTON, Jan. 22.—President Eisenhower today discussed ways of winning support for his foreign trade program with a group of young men from both parties who make up the bipartisan Committee on Foreign Trade Education.

The committee, which was formed from the ranks of young Republican and young Democratic organizations, told the President what it had done to arouse public enthusiasm for a more liberal foreign trade policy. Gen. Eisenhower indorsed their efforts and offered suggestions as to what more could be done in the future.

Urges Work With Public

B. A. Rittersporn jr., executive director of the committee, said the President urged them to work to win general public support, and not to concentrate on trade and business groups alone. The President suggested sending out speakers to service organizations such as the Lions and Kiwanis Clubs, he said.

The President also pointed out the value of university-sponsored programs such as the American Assembly, which he started while he was president of Columbia University. The American Assembly is sponsored by the Graduate School of Business of Columbia, and meets periodically at Arden House, Harriman, N. Y., to discuss national problems.

Accompanied by Rep. Kean

The committee was accompanied on its visit to the White House by Rep. Robert W. Kean, R., N. J. Rep. Kean is a member of the House Ways and Means Committee, before which the group testified yesterday on behalf of the President's foreign trade program.

Besides Mr. Rittersporn, other members of the executive committee are David C. Hamilton, Dan Ruge, Peter Kenton, Jerome Jacobsen, Lionel Furst and John Howart. At the Ways and Means Committee hearing, Rep. Kean pointed out that none of the group is connected with export-import trade in any way, but they simply give their time because of a conviction of the rightness of the President's program.

Backs Eisenhower on Trade

Group Warns on Peril Of Losing Japan to Reds

WASHINGTON, Jan. 21 (AP).—A spokesman for increased free world trade told Congress today if Japan builds trade ties with Red China, then Japan and other Pacific areas may be enslaved by the Communists.

This warning came from B. A. Rittersporn jr., executive director of the Committee on Foreign Trade Education of New York. He said his group was organized by persons who had no self-interest in foreign trade but who felt the general public had little or no knowledge about an issue of "great significance."

Mr. Rittersporn joined the nation's three major farm groups, the United States Council of the International Chamber of Commerce, and the American Association of University Women in generally backing President Eisenhower's program to expand free world trade.

All Groups Testify

All of these groups testified in extended hearings on the program by the House Ways and Means Committee. President Eisenhower has asked for a three-year extension of his authority to negotiate lower tariffs on foreign goods coming into the United States, in exchange for trade advantages for American products abroad.

On the Japanese trade issue, Mr. Rittersporn cited Czechoslovakia as an example of a country which started trade ties with the Communists and then was seized after it became "once enmeshed in the Communist trade orbit."

He said he thought Japan and the Pacific area faced the same spectre.

Some Japanese officials recently have called for more trade with the Communists, and some United States officials have indicated they would have no objections to such trade in non-military items.

Sees Stronger Free World

Warren Lee Pierson, chairman of the United States Council of the International Chamber of Commerce, said the President's program, "by hastening the day when United States foreign aid will no longer be needed, will increase the political strength and cohesion of the free world."

He said American sales abroad remained high during the slight business downturn of late 1953 and 1954 and this "was an important factor in bringing that business decline to en end."

Spokesmen for the American Farm Bureau Federation, the National Grange and the National Farmers Union stressed that farm prosperity is especially dependent upon sale of farm products abroad. They said the President's program would help expand these sales and reduce surpluses here, without curtailing protection against excessive imports in some fields.

Favors More TV On Trade Program

WASHINGTON (INS) — President Eisenhower proposed yesterday greater use of television forums to help stir up public support for the administration's foreign trade program.

He made the suggestion at a meeting with the Committee on Foreign Trade Education, a bipartisan group which supports his proposed liberalization of tariff laws.

Members of the group said Eisenhower urged them to have more of their representatives appear on television forums and engage in as much public contact work as possible to educate the public on the need for lowering trade barriers.

Eisenhower Tells Group Of Foreign Trade Plans

By the Associated Press

President Eisenhower yesterday discussed with a delegation from the Committee on Foreign Trade Education ways to stimulate public interest in his program to increase foreign trade through lowering of tariff barriers.

B. A. Rittersporn, jr. of New York, said the group, a national bipartisa norganization of young people indorsing the President's program, sought and received Mr. Eisenhower's advice on what they can do to mobilize support for it.

He said the President told them to step up the use of speakers before various organizations and try to get more of their members on television forum discussions.

"He sees the need of intensive public support for this program as part of our foreign policy," Mr. Rittersporn told reporters.

Longer Extension Asked

John C. White, counsel of the American Cotton Shippers Association, also called for "an indefinite extension" of the program.

Warren Lee Pierson, chairman of the United States Council of the International Chamber of Commerce, said his group would have preferred a "longer period of extension," but was satisfied that the bill as written "will increase the political strength and cohesion of the free world."

Murray D. Lincoln, president of the Cooperative League, said the trade program should be extended with "proper safeguards" to protect United States industries.

B. A. Rittersporn Jr., executive director of the Committee on Foreign Trade Education, said enactment of H. R. 1 "will represent to the world this nation's willingness to do business."

Also testifying for the bill were D. E. Replogle, chairman of the Friends Committee on National Legislation; Michael Straight, chairman of the International Affairs Commission of the American Veterans Committee, and Dr. Alzada Comstock, representing the American Association of University Women.

BROADER EASING OF TARIFFS URGED

Trade Spokesmen at Hearing Go Beyond Administration's Liberalization Program

ESCAPE CLAUSE ASSAILED

'Peril Point' Also Criticized—Democrats Are Expected to Support Reforms

By BRENDAN M. JONES

Measures that would give a greater degree of permanence to the liberal trade and tariff policies proposed by President Eisenhower, making them less vulnerable to sudden changes and political pressures, were advanced in Washington last week.

Following strong general support of the President's program by high Cabinet officers, proponents of a freer flow of imports as the basic means of expanding American exports and world trade as a whole began offering proposals on specific policy points.

Presented at hearings before the House Ways and Means Committee, these dealt with a longer-than-three-year extension of the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act and a tightening up or elimination of its present "escape clause" and "peril point" provisions.

Among groups that presented testimony or filed statements in the first week of hearings on extension of the trade act, with new tariff-cutting authority for the President, were the National Council of American Importers, the Commerce and Industry Association of New York and the Committee for Foreign Trade Education.

TRADE EDUCATION, INC.

WINTER PROSPECTUS
for 1955
COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN TRADE EDUCATION, INC.

270 PARK AVENUE, NEW YORK 17, N. Y.

PURPOSE: To stir public interest in U. S. tariff-trade policy and to mobilize wide support for a liberalization of that policy.

MEMBERSHIP: Bipartisan, volunteer membership drawn in large part from Young Republican and Young Democratic Clubs of New York City area. Membership in the local area currently totals over 600 and is continuing to grow. Committee chapters are being activated in San Francisco, New Orleans, Norfolk and Boston. In addition, contact has been made with interested groups in Los Angeles, Chicago, and Cleveland.

APPROACH: Faced with the appalling fact (disclosed by The Gallup Poll) that 54% of the people know nothing about the national battle on tariffs, we have given our entire campaign a "grass roots" orientation—taking it right to the general public. The appeal is to the man-in-the-street from fellow citizens whose only interest is civic. The average man is shown his stake in expanding U. S. trade — and that to be effective in bringing about trade policy reform he must become articulate. The three main premises of our argument are—consumer interest; the importance of trade to an expanding national economy; and the grave, urgent necessity of cementing the Free World Coalition by trade.

Scientific Poll-Taking

One of The Committee's most significant projects during the pre-election period was a poll of all Congressional candidates from New York City, Northern New Jersey, Long Island, Westchester County and Southern Connecticut to determine their stands on the tariff-trade issue. The Poll disclosed surprisingly wide acceptance of The Randall Commission Program as a symbol, but, also, revealed that many would-be Congressmen, who reported themselves generally in favor of the Program, were opposed to many specific, and essential, parts of it. Results on specific pairs of opponents were released to the appropriate community newspapers, while a round-up was released through the metropolitan New York Press. Public service efforts of this nature are a continuing part of The Committee's program.

OBJECTIVES, WINTER, 1955

U.S. participation in GATT (General Agreement on Tariffs & Trade)

Renewed effort to simplify customs procedures (as in Second Jenkins Bill)

Reciprocal Trade Agreement with Japan

Extension and reform of Reciprocal Trade Agreements Program. (This will probably, also, bring a discussion of "Peril Point" and "Escape Clause" provisions).

The battle on U.S. tariff-trade policy is on! Both President Eisenhower and Democratic Congressional leaders have given it priority in the new Congress. The high tariff bloc has not, however, given up by default. Their principle organizations increased their lobbying expenditures on an average of over 300% for the first half of 1954 alone. To win the fight for a modern, realistic national trade policy, we invite you to support the Committee in its mobilization of public opinion.

STATEMENT OF

THE COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN TRADE EDUCATION, INC.

IN BEHALF OF H. R. # 1

TO THE

HOUSE WAYS & MEANS COMMITTEE

FRIDAY, JANUARY 21st, 1955

Mr. Chairman and members of the House Ways & Means Committee:

My name is B. A. Rittersporn, Jr. I am Executive Director of the Committee on Foreign Trade Education, Inc.

The Committee, a bi-partisan, 100% volunteer organization, embarked a year ago on a campaign to bring to the general public a greater knowledge of the importance of international trade to this nation's financial prosperity and political security. We have also made an effort to mobilize wide support for a liberalization of the nation's present foreign trade laws - for reasons to which I will refer below.

The Committee, with national headquarters at 270 Park Avenue, New York City, has undertaken this work because it considers foreign trade to be of great significance to the United States. The six persons who founded the organization were appalled that, according to public opinion polls, a majority of the people had absolutely no knowledge of the tariff-trade problem. The fact was that the national debate on the issue was directed almost exclusively to the business community. Our members, none of whom has any particular self-interest in foreign trade, have worked to expand the debate with the knowledge that an informed public opinion can best serve the country and aid the Congress in arriving at the proper solution of the problem.

Briefly, the techniques we have used in informing the public have been these: rallies; meetings; publications; scientific poll-taking and canvassing, press, radio, TV publicity, literature distribution (by hand and by mail) and a speakers service for community groups throughout the areas in which we are now operating.

Although it is not a characteristic part of our operation, we are very happy to have the opportunity to testify in behalf of H.R.#1 today and to attempt to convey to you why the members of the Committee on Foreign Trade Education, Inc. (over 600 in New York) feel its enactment is necessary.

* * * * * *

The issue which most concerns our membership is the integral part foreign economic policy plays in the development of our foreign political policy as the nation goes through a period in which it, and the entire free world, is menaced by Communist aggression. The Soviet bosses have detected what they consider to be a prime defect in our foreign policy. Premier Malenkov has stated: "American imperialism is acting today, not only as an international exploiter and enslaver of nations, but also as a force that is disrupting the economics of the other capitalist countries... boosting their exports through the most unscrupulous dumping while at the same time closing their home markets to foreign goods. The economic policy pursued by American imperialists is bound to aggravate the antagonism between the United States and other capitalistic countries."

The Communists seek to exploit this alleged antagonism. They have, during the last few years, concluded trade agreements with many of the most important states in the world. Mr. Stassen's Battle Act Report in 1954 listed 38 non-communist countries as trading with Russia, China and the satellites. Almost every day one reads of another non-communist trade mission traveling to the east. The Communist powers tell the nations of the world, many still suffering war damage and many more endeavoring to raise their living standards from the most primitive levels, in effect, that the "U S talks about the benefits of free enterprise and attempts to make you reduce your own trade barriers - but does not practice what it preaches."

The U S policy of so-called "protectionism" is now being thrown up to us by Communists and neutralists in every nation of the world. Foreign countries in many cases are excluded from the U S market, or when they appreciate a margin of success, are confronted by new barriers to their commerce. Unable to earn enough dollars to trade in this country, they are being forced into economic isolationism or into the Communist trade orbit. One of your distinguished members, Mr. Kean, an honorary member of the Committee on Foreign Trade Education, Inc., has pointed to this danger: "One of the great dangers of failure to enact a realistic trade program is that we may force friendly nations to greatly increase trade with Russia and Communist China." And your chairman, the honorable gentleman from Tennessee, has stated: "The need for an expanded trade within the free world is made all the more urgent by the efforts of the Soviet Bloc to encourage our allies to trade with them and thereby become economically dependent upon Soviet markets and sources of supply."

A high-ranking officer of the Defense Department, Captain W. B. Thorpe, U S N (Ret.), has put it another way, perhaps, even more tersely: "It puts the United States in a most difficult negotiating position when on one hand we urge friendly countries to reduce their trade with the Soviet bloc and Communist China, and on the other hand, curtail their markets in the United States..."

We support Mr. Cooper's bill, H.R. #1, because we believe its enactment will represent to the world this nation's willingness to do business. It signals a conservative, rational, completely realistic effort by the U S to stimulate the exchange of goods and services that will, upon the negotiation of reciprocal agreements, promote the prosperity of all - this nation, our allies and potential allies. H. R. #1 will give this nation, at least, the beginnings of a foreign economic policy that builds up - instead of tears down - our foreign political policy.

H. R. #1 would not in any sense bring a revolutionary change to our tariff structure. The 5% annual reduction authorized, is not absolute. It means, rather, that as a result of reciprocal negotiation, an item which today is subject to a 20% import duty, would be reduced to 19% the first year, to 18% the second year and to 17% the third year. The reform would, however, we firmly believe, give a stability to our foreign economic policy that would improve our international position. It would also give an impetus to the prosperity of our own economy.

The productive capacity of this nation is such that a healthy volume of exports must be maintained and expanded yearly. Agriculture depends on foreign markets to a very large degree. The tobacco, cotton, wheat, rice and dried fruit producers all must export between one-quarter and one-half of what they produce to survive. And industry has a great stake in the promotion of export sales. More than 10% of the following manufactured products is sold abroad: tinplate, hand tools, primary batteries, refrigerators, machine tools, rolling-mill machinery, construction and mining equipment, oil field machinery, textile machinery, sewing machines, food products machinery, ball and roller bearings, typewriters, calculating and accounting machines, printing machinery, agricultural machinery, harvest machinery and combines, tractors, motor trucks and coaches, civilian aircraft, medicinal chemicals, and DDT.

The fact is that American prosperity - its growing prosperity - depends on an expanding foreign trade. "Protectionism" however, undermines that opportunity and handicaps American industry with its 4½ million workers (7% of the total work force) who are directly dependent on export sales. The reason is, as Clarence Randall has observed, "a tariff that cuts imports is a tariff that cuts exports." A U S trade program that will cut the dollar gap - reported to be at approximately 2½ billion dollars for 1954 by The National Foreign Trade Council last Monday - will give foreign countries the means by which they can earn dollars to buy in the U S. We support H.R. #1 because it will help lessen the dollar gap and promote the sale of U S products abroad. We are sure of that because the Reciprocal Trade concept has proven itself statistically: "For the two years 1938 and 1939, as compared with the years 1934 and 1935, the United States' exports to trade agreement countries increased 63% as against an increase of 32% in exports to non-agreement countries". (from "What Policy on Trade?" by Morris S. Rosenthal)

We also endorse the other areas of tariff reductions authorized by H.R. #1, specifically where duty rates are above 50% or where goods are being imported into this country in negligible quantities. This section of the bill has real meaning for some tariffs remain very high. (The New York Times reports "over 900 on which U S tariffs stand at 40% or above", and we note that there are slightly more than 100 items imported from Italy alone, where we seek to stop Communism, which bear the ad valorem equivalent of over 60%)

We know, of course, that many very reputable persons have suggested that the reforms embodied in H.R. #1 are insufficient. Thus the C E D has urged an extension of the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Program for five years. And we recall that The New York Times reported that the Randall Commission had all but come to the decision to recommend an extension of ten years. We feel, however, that H.R. #1 is, under the circumstances, the best proposal, in that it can command the greatest amount of support from the people of the nation and will, at the same time, by proving our many avowals, produce the intended political and economic advantages abroad.

We do, however, strongly urge that H.R. #1 be extended to restrict the use of the so-called "Escape Clause" provision. We fully agree that, as in all business operations, the contracting parties should retain reasonable safeguards - means for cancellation or modification. The "Escape Clause" as written, however, has prompted abuse of the entire Reciprocal Trade concept. As the "Escape Clause" now stands, our trade agreements are subject to an unceasing amount of harassment and review, which precludes the stability in which trade and commerce thrives. A reform of the "Escape Clause", in line with the purposes of Mr. Cooper's bill, would narrow the amount of consideration The Tariff Commission would give to the speculative realm of "potential danger"; and would lessen the possibility of countless rehearings (the lobbyists seemingly hope that their special interests will succeed by attrition).

The "Escape Clause", in essence a necessary safeguard, recognizes the fact that a few inefficient industries will be injured by a liberalization of tariff-trade policy. That number is small when compared with the predominant interest in expanding exports. It has been demonstrated during the last year that even such areas as the First Congressional District of Iowa, the State of Ohio, and other areas (in many cases as secondary and tertiary suppliers) profit very measurably from international trade. In keeping proper focus, we point to Mr. Walter Lippmann's statement of a few days ago: "The notion that the American market can be 'flooded' with foreign goods all coming one way cannot be true. For what on earth would the foreigner want to do with the dollars he earns? What good are American dollars to a foreigner unless he, or someone to whom he sells his dollars, spends them in the United States?"

We realize, however, that some Americans would be injured by tariff reduction. It has been estimated that over a long period of time that up to 100,000 workers might lose employment by a liberalization of our current policy. This is a small number when compared to the 4½ millions who stand to benefit directly by an expansion of trade. And it is, according to Fortune Magazine, less than the average monthly U S job turn-over. That 100,000 (or only 35,000 as your colleague, Mr. Eberharter has estimated) is, we appreciate, not a mere statistic, but represents individual human beings.

We, therefore, agree with the proposal made by your former colleague, Mr. Javits, The Attorney General of New York State. In addressing our organization recently, he maintained that those who are asked to make a sacrifice in the national interest should be given government aid to readjust. Mr. Javits, an honorary member of The Committee, pointed to the precedent whereby the government has aided in re-tooling industry, in setting up communities for workers, etc. during the recent wars. Such assistance in the national interest should again be given. We therefore endorse the principle contained in Mr. Williams' recent bill, the "Trade Adjustment Act of 1955", H.R. #229.

One of H. R. #1's great values is the recognition it gives to the manifest problems of Japan and the provision it makes by which the U S can bulwark Japan's position in the Free World. The Japanese are an essential ally in preserving the Pacific from Communist domination. The Japanese, however, are known to be in a precarious position. A staggering birth rate and a dearth of raw materials makes Japan a have-not nation, a nation that can only survive by selling its skills to the world. We, who possess a degree of productivity far surpassing their own, can, both for the obvious political reasons and for the benefit of our own consumers, allow Japan to trade with us.

Speaking as an individual, I must report what I consider to be a very dangerous contention made to me by the executive secretary of The American Tariff League (in a debate at Pace College, New York City). He said that Japan should be encouraged to find its "natural channels of trade" - by which the High Tariff spokesman indicated he specifically meant Communist China. I think, gentlemen, as do the members of the organization which I represent, that the spectre of Czechoslovakia proves what Japan's fate - what the Pacific's fate - would be once enmeshed in the Communist trade orbit.

Finally, gentlemen, a word - usually unsaid. Trade has a great meaning to the consumer. An expansion of trade can produce a better, more varied life for the people of this country even in what they eat and wear every day. The selfish interests of a small minority should not be allowed to continue to deprive all the people of the benefits of the free market any longer.

The Committee on Foreign Trade Education, Inc. does hope that you will approve H. R. #1 and that it will be enacted by The Congress promptly. We believe that the stakes in this issue, as it confronts you and the nation, are extremely high: as The President has said: "If we fail in our trade policy, we may fail in all." What you do on trade will be the touchstone for success in our foreign policy; stimulation of our national economy; and aid to the consumer.

We earnestly hope that our friend, Mr. Paul G. Hoffman, in writing a message for our newsletter, was correct when he foresaw: "there are good signs that we may be on the way toward freer trade, and...we have good reason to expect that the Kremlin's plans will be firmly blunted by a rising determination among the free countries to achieve real success in world trade as in the other fields upon which their aggregate strength depends."

Thank you very much for the opportunity you have given The Committee on Foreign Trade Education, Inc.

Dear Bill:

Thank you for your letter.

I am sorry to have to tell you that there seems to be no way in which we might work together in the immediate future.

I do not at this point know what is going to happen to SEE IT NOW in the autumn since we are short of a sponsor. It would seem that unless something new develops there are no prospects here.

Sincerely yours,

Dear Ed,

Recently Mr.O'Shea,in reply to a 'mea culpa' letter from me,unbent to the extent of permitting CBS to buy an 'occasional' script from me. I have since sold three or four radio plays to CBS. But the pickins are slim.

Last year,as you may have heard,I spent ten months in Paris writing thirty TV originals for "Captain Gallant" and "Paris Precinct."

However,I have never felt that straight dramatic writing was my dish of tea; I find it extremely difficult to generate adequate interest and enthusiasm for these ephemeral packets of baby talk.

Your wonderful contributions to TV are the only ones for which I feel genuine empathy. I view each "See it Now" and "Person to Person" with a mixture of tremendous enthusiasm and great envy that I am not in some way, ANY way, associated with you in the creation of your kind of television.

It seems kind of too bad that my years of experience in documentary and news dramatization are not being utilized in TV. And the only place where they could be properly utilized is with your outfit.

Can we work together?

Best regards,
Bill

Dear Mr. Morrow:

You undoubtedly have received many compliments on your fine talk in Louisville on January 22, and I would like to add mine.

I was particularly pleased to hear a man of your prominence take such a strong stand on the loss of personal freedom which is occurring in this country today. Your stand on this issue, I know, is not a recent one. While many of your audience agreed with you I am afraid that a good number will continue to offer passive resistance to what surely is an insidiuous atrophy of a basic human right, at least in this country.

Perhaps my interpretation of a part of your talk was not in accord with its intent, but I was given to believe (and I hope that I am right) that you, too, are appalled at the injustice accorded to American prisoners of war who, because of their inability to withstand the mental punishment they were subjected to, finally cracked and discredited this country. I sometimes wonder if the members of these kangaroo courts could have done much better.

I am sincere in my desire to do something about this perversion of justice, for the idea that a man is guilty until proved innocent is wholly inconsistent with our system of jurisprudence. A new policy must be established immediately, for I feel many of us would prefer suicide if taken prisoner rather than face the consequences of an unmerciful courts-martial.

Congratulations for your constant sticking-out- your- neckness!

Sincerely,
Frank C. Rocco

Dear Ed:

You know, I am sure, of my great interest in International House and all that it stands for. In fact, you were kind enough to make a gift to the House quite recently to help us along in our efforts to do the best possible job we can with the students from all over the world that come together here.

Each year, in May, we hold our last Sunday supper at the House, the final and most important event of the year for us. It would be a special pleasure for me and a tremendous lift for the House if you would be willing to be our speaker. The supper is planned for either May 1st or May 8th.

This last Sunday evening takes the form of a candlelight service with the dining tables radiating from a central point where a large lighted candle burns. At the end of the meeting one of the students makes a simple statement of the meaning of International House and its effort to spread brotherhood throughout the world. Withe the room darkened, and with candles at each place, those nearest the central candle light their own from it, and pass on the light to others until it reaches the farthest corners of the room, symbolizing the spread of world brotherhood as the students return to their homes in all parts of the earth. It makes a most impressive spectacle.

In other years, we have had as our speakers at this service a number of distinguished persons including Eleanor Roosevelt, Anna Rosenberg, George C. Marshall, Pierson Dixon, and John Foster Dulles. If you were willing to be our speaker this year, I know that the students as well as the Trustees would be thrilled. Frankly, I do not believe you would need to write out a speech as I am sure that there are a great many things in your heart which the students would like to hear. This would be a great service to the House if you feel you are in a position to do it.

May I express my warm congratulations for the fine job you have been doing and continue to do in keeping us all better informed and more aware of the world we live in.

Sincerely,

David Rockefeller

Dear Mrs. Rogers:

Just a note to thank you first for your thoughtfulness in sending along your new book -- "My Spiritual Diary."

I read it from cover to cover with considerable interest and assure you that in what you have to say many will find greater peace of mind and understanding.

Certainly, in the world today, we can use a little of both.

Incidentally, I am sending you a copy of the second edition of "This I Believe." If you haven't already read it, I think you will find some of the material in it stimulating.

Am really looking forward to our visit with you and Roy next Friday. I think it should be great fun. Til then, my kindest personal regards.

My dear Ed:

I have had a young secretary in the country for several years and she wants now to come to New York and find a job so that she can complete college. She is interested in the kind of work that you are doing and would especially like to have an opportunity to join your staff in some capacity. Her name is Miss Doris Muller and she will be here at my apartment until the 31st of March. She would like to see you at any time that is convenient for you if this is possible. My telephone here is TEmpleton 8-0330.

I talked to Dr. Fromm and think he will try to see you too. I think they will need a great deal more advice on what they hope to accomplish.

Dear Mr. Murrow:

In this same mail delivery you will have a letter from Mrs. Roosevelt which she graciously wrote in my behalf. It would give me much pleasure to have an opportunity to meet and talk with you. Your interests and your work in support of them have long been a source of inspiration to me.

As Mrs. Roosevelt has explained, I am very anxious to move to New York City where I may work and attend college in order to obtain my degree. My resignation from my present position as Mrs. Roosevelt's secretary is to be effective May first of this year. If there should be a possibility of obtaining employment as a member of your staff I shall be grateful indeed but in the event that there are no openings expected in the near future I would nevertheless appreciate an interview at your convenience. Though I do not wish to appear presumptuous, it is my ardent desire to talk with you in the hope that you may be willing to advise me.

With my thanks for your attention to my request go my deep respect and admiration for you personally and all that you represent.

Dear Herb:

Thanks for letting me read the William Bradford Huie piece.

It's a first-class job of reporting, but for television purposes it would have to be dramatized and none of the shows with which I am concerned is equipped to deal with dramatic productions.

Thanks for letting me read it, and give Brad my best regards when you see him.

Memo to: Ed Murrow
From: Bill Huie

Mr. Murrow, I have asked Mrs. Jackson to show you this in the strictest confidence.

You will, of course, understand why it must be Secret until January 10th.

I'd like to make this into a TV documentary -- even at the risk of jeopardizing a substantial deal for a film "based on" or "inspired by" it.

Perhaps TV handling is impossible. I don't have time to watch TV much. But I assume that if it can be done, you are the one man who can do it.

There are no legal obstacles. I am in the position -- unprecedented in a case like this -- of being able to film this story as a documentary, using real names for live actors portraying all the principals.

I envision a film which could be shot in a few days -- I could write the script in 12 hours -- a film which could explain completely the nature of the racial struggle in America in 1956. This is the characteristic crime of the struggle. It contains all the elements: sex, the fears of "mongrelization" and "equalization;" the willingness to kill in order to intimidate;" everything.

I would appear in the film -- in the field -- as the reporter with the truth. We would re-create the incident at the store; the abduction; the cat-and-mouse maneuvers; the beating in the tool house; the search for the weight; the murder scene at the river bank. (LOOK is using this last as its illustration.)

I would confine myself to drama, not opinion. But in the drama -- in the hate-filled exchanges between Bobo Till and Big Milam -- we could express the entire conflict. Big Milam is the logical projection of White Supremacy.

You could speak the measured paragraphs of interpretation.

I might be able to persuade Elia Kazan to direct this effort. He and I are working together on two other projects; and he is presently shooting at Greenville, Miss. But any good director could handle it.

My own position for an effort like this is perfect. I am a Southerner of many generations; and I have the confidence of land owners in the Delta. (This is why I could get the story in the first place.) At the same time I have the respect of the NAACP and the Negro press. I won an NAACP award 18 years ago; I had Roy Wilkins assistance on some phases of this story; and I was on the 1954 Honor Roll of The Chicago Defender. The Pittsburgh Courier raised funds for me in the Ruby McCollum case.

So I'm a man whose specialty is finding the truth and letting the chips fall.

This magazine piece is indicative of what I would like to do in a documentary film. The piece is not an essay; it contains not a word of opinion. I have simply done what the Mississippi courts and 100 reporters could not do: I have established the facts.

I'd like to do the same in a film.

Only TV could use the documentary. We couldn't do a documentary successfully for motion pictures. When I make a motion picture you know what I have to do: add "entertainment values." And in this process of adding "entertainment values," we lose all the force of simple dramatization of the truth.

I suppose there are all sorts of reasons why this can't be done. But if you can think of a way in which it can be, I'll be glad to confer.

If your judgment is against it, I'll appreciate your rejecting it yourself -- with the minimum of consultation.

A leak during this holiday season is something we can't afford to risk.

My best wishes.....

HOW EMMETT TILL WAS SLAIN

By

William Bradford Huie

Disclosed here for the first time is the true account of the slaying in Mississippi of a Negro youth named Emmett Till.

Last September, in Sumner Mississippi, a petit jury found the youth's admitted abductors not guilty of murder. In November, in Greenwood, a Grand Jury declined to indict them for kidnapping. Of the murder trial The Memphis Commercial-Appeal said: "Evidence necessary for convicting on a murder charge was lacking."

But with truth absent, hypocrisy and myth have flourished. Now, hypocrisy can be exposed; myth dispelled. Here are the facts.

Carolyn Holloway Bryant is 21, five feet tall, weighs 103 pounds. An Irish girl, with black hair and black eyes, she is a small-farmer's daughter who at 17 quit high school at Indianola, Mississippi, to marry a soldier, Roy Bryant, then 20, now 24. The couple have two boys, three and two; and they operate a store at a dusty crossroads called Money: postoffice, filling station and three stores clustered around a school and a gin, and set in the vast, lonely cotton patch that is the Mississippi Delta.

Carolyn and Roy Bryant are poor: no car, no TV. They live in the back of the store which Roy's brothers helped set up when he got out of the 82nd Airborne in 1953. They sell "snuff-and-fatback" to Negro field hands on credit; and they earn little because, for one reason, the government has begun giving the Negroes food they formerly bought.

Carolyn and Roy Bryant's social life is visits to their families, to the Baptist church, and, whenever they can borrow a car, to a drive-in, with the kids sleeping in the back seat. They call Shane the best picture they ever saw.

For extra money Carolyn tends store when Roy works outside -- like truck driving for a brother. And he has many brothers. His mother had two husbands, 11 children. The first five -- all boys -- were "Milam children;" the next six -- three boys, three girls -- were "Bryant children."

This is a lusty and devoted clan. They work, fight, vote and play as a family. The "half" in their fraternity is forgotten. For years they have operated a chain of cotton field stores, as well as trucks and mechanical cotton pickers. In relation to the Negroes they are somewhat like white traders in portions of Africa today; and they are determined to resist the revolt of colored men against white rule.

On Wednesday evening, August 24, 1955, Roy was in Texas, on a brother's truck. He had carted shrimp from New Orleans to San Antonio, proceeded to Brownsville. Carolyn was alone in the store. But back in the living quarters was her sister-in-law Juanita Milam, 27, with her own two small sons and Carolyn's two. The store was kept open until 9 on week-nights, 11 on Saturday.

When her husband was away Carolyn Bryant never slept in the store, never stayed there alone after dark. Moreover, in the Delta, no white woman or group of white women ever travels country roads after dark unattended by a man.

This meant that during Roy's absences -- particularly since he had no car -- there was family inconvenience. Each afternoon a sister-in-law arrived to stay with Carolyn until closing time. Then the two women, with their children, waited for a brother-in-law to convey them to his home. Next morning the sister-in-law drove Carolyn back.

Juanita Milam had driven from her home in Glendora. She had parked in front of the store and to the left; and under the front seat of this car was Roy Bryant's pistol: a .38 Colt automatic. Carolyn knew it was there. After 9 Juanita's husband, J. W. Milam, would arrive in his pickup to shepherd them to his home for the night.

About 7:30 p. m. eight young Negroes -- seven boys and a girl -- in a '46 Ford had stopped outside. They included sons, grandsons, and a nephew of Moses "Preacher" Wright, 64, a 'cropper. They were 13-19. Four were natives of the Delta, and others, including the nephew, Emmett "Bobo" Till, were visiting from the Chicago area.

Bobo Till was 14 years old; born on July 25, 1941. He was stocky, muscular, weighing about 160, five feet four or five. Preacher later testified: "He looked like a man."

Bobo's party joined a dozen other young Negroes, including two other girls, in front of the store. Bryant had built checker boards there: some were playing checkers, others were wrestling and "kiddin' about girls."

Bobo bragged about his white girl. He showed the boys a picture of a white girl in his wallet; and, to their jeers of disbelief, he boasted of his success with her.

"You talkin' mighty big, Bo," one youth said. "There's a pretty little white woman in the store. Since you know how to handle white girls, let's see you go in and get a date with her?"

"You ain't chicken are yuh, Bo?" another youth taunted him.

Bobo had to fire or fall back. He entered the store, alone, stopped at the candy case. Carolyn was behind the counter; Bobo in front. He asked for two cents worth of bubble gum. She handed it to him. He squeezed her hand and said: "How about a date, Baby?"

She jerked away and started for Juanita Milam. At the break between counters Bobo jumped in front of her, [redacted] caught her at the waist and said:

"You needn't be afraid o' me, Baby. I been with white girls before."

At this point a cousin ran in, grabbed Bobo, and began pulling him out of the store. Carolyn now ran, not for Juanita, but out the front and got the pistol from the Milam car.

Outside, with Bobo being ushered off by his cousins, and with Carolyn getting the gun, Bobo executed the "wolf whistle" which gave the case its name.

> The Wolf-Whistle Murder: A Negro "child" or "boy" whistled at her and they murdered him.

That was the sum of the facts on which most newspaper readers based an opinion.

The Negroes drove away; and Carolyn, shaken, told Juanita. The two women determined to keep the incident from their "menfolks." They didn't tell J. W. Milam when he came to escort them home.

By Thursday afternoon Carolyn Bryant could see the story was getting around. She spent Thursday night at the Milams, where at 4 a. m. (Friday) Roy got back from Texas. Since he had slept little for five nights, he went to bed at the Milams while Carolyn returned to the store.

During Friday afternoon Roy reached the store, and shortly thereafter a Negro told him what "the talk" was, and told him that the "Chicago boy" was "visitin' Preacher." Carolyn then told Roy what had happened.

Once Roy Bryant knew, in his environment, in the opinion of most white people around him, for him to have done nothing would have marked him a coward and a fool.

On Friday night he couldn't do anything. He and Carolyn were alone, and he had no car. Saturday was collection day, their busy day in the store. About 10:30 Saturday night J. W. Milam drove by. Roy took him aside.

"I want you to come over early in the morning," he said. "I need a little transportation."

J. W. protested: "Sunday's the only morning I can sleep. Can't we make it around noon?"

Roy then told him.

"I'll be here," he said. "Early."

J. W. drove to another brother's store at Minter City, where he was working. He closed that store about 12:30 a. m.; drove home to Glendora. Juanita was away, visiting her folks at Greenville. J. W. had been thinking. He decided not to go to bed. He pumped the pickup -- a half-ton, '55 Chevrolet -- full of gas and headed for Money.

J. W. "Big Milam" is 36; six-two, 235 pounds; an extrovert. Short boots accentuate his height; khaki trousers; red sport shirt; sun helmet. Dark-visaged, his lower lip curls when he chuckles; and though bald, his remaining hair is jet-black.

He is slavery's plantation overseer. Today he rents Negro-driven mechanical cotton pickers to plantation owners. Those who know him say he can handle Negroes better than anybody in the county.

Big Milam soldiered in the Patton manner. With a ninth grade education, the 75th Division commissioned him in battle. He was expert platoon leader; expert street fighter; expert in night patrol; expert with the "grease gun," with every device for close-range killing. A German bullet tore clear through his chest; his body bears "multiple shrapnel wounds." Of his medals he cherishes one: Combat Infantryman.

Big Milam, like many soldiers, brought home his favorite gun: the .45 Colt automatic pistol.

"Best weapon the Army's got," he says. "Either for shootin' or sluggin'."

Two hours after Big Milam got the word -- the instant minute he could close the store -- he was looking for the Chicago Negro.

Big Milam reached Money a few minutes shy of 2 a. m., Sunday, August 28th. The Bryants were asleep; the store was dark but for the all-night light. He rapped at the back door, and when Roy came he said: "Let's go. Let's make that trip now."

Roy dressed, brought a gun: this one ~~about~~ was a .45 Colt. Both men were -- and remained -- cold sober. Big Milam had drunk a beer at Minter City around 9; Roy had had nothing.

There was no moon as they drove to Preacher's house: 2.8 miles east of Money.

Preacher's house stands fifty feet right of the gravel road, with cedar and persimmon trees in the yard. Big Milam drove the pickup in under the trees. He was bare-headed, carrying a five-cell

Roy Bryant pounded on the door.

Preacher: "Whozzat?"

Bryant: "Mr. Bryant, from Money, Preacher."

Preacher: "All right, sir. Just a minute."

Preacher came out on the screened-in porch.

Bryant: "Preacher, you got a boy from Chicago here?"

Preacher: "Yessir."

Bryant: "I want to talk to him."

Preacher: "Yessir. I'll get him."

Preacher led them to a back bedroom where four youths were sleeping in two beds. In one was Bobo Till and Simeon Wright, Preacher's youngest son. Bryant had told Preacher to turn on the lights; Preacher had said they were out of order. So only the flashlight was used.

The visit was not a complete surprise. Preacher testified that he had heard of the "trouble;" that he "sho' had" talked to his nephew about it. Bobo himself had been afraid; he had wanted to go home the day after the incident. The Negro girl in the party had urged that he leave. "They'll kill him," she had warned. But Preacher's wife, Elizabeth Wright, had decided that the danger was being magnified; she had urged Bobo to "finish yo' visit."

"I thought they might say something to him, but I didn't think they'd kill a boy," Preacher said.

Big Milam shined th light in Bobo's face, said: "You the nigger who did the talking?"

"Yeah," Bobo replied.

Milam: "Don't say Yeah to me: I'll blow your head off. Get your clothes on." ~~Best if you niggers go back to sleep.~~"

Bobo had been sleeping in his shorts. He pulled on a shirt and trousers, then reached for his socks.

"Just the shoes," Milam hurried him.

"I dont' wear shoes without socks," Bobo said; Milam kept the gun-bearers waiting while he put on his socks, then a pair of canvas shoes with thick crepe soles.

Preacher and his wife tried two arguments in the boy's behalf.

"He ain't got good sense," Preacher begged. "He didn't know what he was doing. Don't take him."

"I'll pay you gentlemen for the damages," Elizabeth Wright said.

"You niggers go back to sleep," Milam replied.

They marched him into the yard, told him to get in the back of the pickup and lie down. He obeyed. They drove toward Money.

Elizabeth Wright rushed to the home of a white neighbor who got up, looked around, but decided he could do nothing. Then she and Preacher drove to the home of her brother, Crosby Smith, at Sumner; and Crosby Smith, on Sunday morning, went to the sheriff's office at Greenwood.

The other young Negroes stayed at Preacher's house until daylight, when Wheeler Parker telephoned his mother in Chicago, who in turn notified Bobo's mother, Mamie Bradley, 33, 6437 S. St. Lawrence.

Had there been any doubt as to the identity of the "Chicago boy who done the talking," Milam and Bryant would have stopped at the store for Carolyn to identify him. But there had been no denial. So they didn't stop at the store. At Money they crossed the Tallahatchie River and drove west.

Their intention was to "just whip him...and scare some sense into him," And for this chore Big Milam knew "the scariest place in the Delta." He had come upon it last year hunting wild geese. Over close to Rosedale the Big River bends around under a bluff. "Brother, she's a 100-foot sheer drop, and she's a 100 feet deep after you hit."

Big Milam's idea was to stand him up there on that bluff, "whip" him with the .45, and then shine the light off down there toward that water and make him think you're gonna knock him in.

"Brother, if that won't scare the Chicago_____ hell won't."

Searching for this bluff they drove close to 75 miles. Through Shelbmound, Schlater, Doddsville, Ruleville, Cleveland, to the intersection south of Rosedale. There they turned south on Mississippi No. 1, toward the entrance to Beulah Lake. They tried several dirt and gravel roads, drove along the levee. Finally, they gave up: in the darkness Big Milam couldn't find his bluff.

They drove back to Milam's house at Glendora, and by now it was 5 a.m. They had been driving nearly three hours, with Milam and Bryant in the cab and Bobo lying in the back.

At some point when the truck slowed down, why hadn't Bobo jumped and run? He wasn't tied; nobody was holding him. A partial answer is that those Chevrolet pickups have a wrap-around rear window the size of a windshield. Bryant could watch him. But the real answer is the remarkable part of the story.

Bobo wasn't afraid of them! He was tough as they were. He didn't think they had the guts to kill him.

Milam: "We never were able to scare him. They had just filled him so full of that poison he was hopeless."

Back of Milam's home is a tool house, with two rooms each about 12 feel square. They took him there and began "whipping" him. First Milam, then Bryant smashing him across the head with those .45s. Pistol-whipping: a court-martial offense in the Army...but MPs have been known to do it...and Milam got information out of German prisoners this way.

But under these blows Bobo never hollered -- and he kept making the perfect speeches to insure martyrdom.

Bobo: "You bastards, I'm not afraid of you. I'm as good as you are. I've_____white women. My grandmother was a white woman."

Milam: "Well, what else could we do? He was hopeless. I'm no bully; I never hurt a nigger in my life. I like niggers -- in their place -- I know how to work 'em. But I just decided it was time a few people got put on notice. As long as I live and can do anything about it, niggers are gonna stay in their place.

Niggers ain't gonna vote where I live. If they did, they'd control the government. They ain't gonna go to school with my kids. And when a nigger even gets close to mentioning sex with a white woman, he's tired o' livin'. Im likely to kill him. Me and my folks fought for this country, and we've got some rights. I stood there in that shed and listened to that nigger throw that poison at me, and I just made up my mind. 'Chicago boy,' I said, 'I'm tired of 'em sending your kind down here to stir up trouble. Goddam you, I'm going to make an example of you -- just so everybody can know how me and my folks stand."

So Big Milam decided to act. He needed a weight. He tried to think where he could get an anvil. Then he remembered a gin which had installed new equipment. He had seen two men lifting a discarded fan, a metal fan three feet high and circular, used in ginning cotton.

Bobo wasn't bleeding much. Pistol-whipping bruises more that it cuts. They ordered him back in the truck and headed west again. They passed through Doddsville, went to the Progressive Ginning Company. This gin is 3.4 miles east of Boyle: Boyle is two miles south of Cleveland. The road to this gin turns left off U.S. 61 after you cross the bayou bridge south of Boyle.

Milam: "When we got to that gin it was daylight, and I was worried for the first time. Somebody might see us and accuse us of stealing the fan."

Bryant and Big Milam stood aside while Bobo loaded the fan. Weight: 74 pounds. The youth still thought they were bluffing.

They drove back to Glandore, then north toward Swan Lake and crossed the "new bridge" over the Tallahatchie. At the east end of this bridge they turned right, along a dirt road which parallels the river. After about two miles they crossed the property of L.W. Boyce, passing near his house.

About 1.5 miles southeast of the Boyce home is a lonely spot where Big Milam has hunted squirrels. The river bank is steep. The truck stopped 30 yards from the water.

Big Milam ordered Bobo to pick up the fan.

He staggered under its weight...carried it to the river bank.

They stodd silently...just hating one another.

Milam: "Take off your clothes."

Slowly, Bobo sat down, pulled off his shoes, his socks. He stood up, unbuttoned his shirt, dropped his pants, his shorts.

He stood there naked.

It was Sunday morning, a little before 7.

Milam: "You still as good as I am?"

Bobo: "Yeah."

Milam: "You've still_____white women?"

Bobo: "Yeah."

That big .45 jumped in big Milam's hand; and the youth had turned his eyes to catch that big, expanding bullet at his right ear. He dropped.

They barb-wired the gin fan to his neck, rolled him into 20 feet of water.

For three hours that morning there was a fire in Big Milam's back yard: Bobo's crepe-soled shoes were hard to burn.

Seventy-two hours later -- eight miles downstream -- boys were fishing. They saw feet sticking out of the water. Bobo.

Big Milam has a clear conscience. He's sorry he had to kill Bobo, but he's not sorry he did. He would do it again under the same circumstances.

To Big Milam his killing Bobo was exactly like his killing Germans. He feels his "community" approved both acts.

The majority -- by no means all, but the majority -- of the white people in Mississippi 1) either approve Big Milam's action, or else 2) they don't disapprove enough to risk giving their "enemies" the satisfaction of a conviction.

Dear Mr. Rossides:

Thank you for your letter of January 6th.

It would indeed be interesting to talk with your uncle, Mr. George Rossides, on the subject of Cyprus but very much regret that I will be unable to grant him an interview. My crowded radio and television schedule makes it impossible for me to give interviews on subjects that are not directly connected with my own program.

Sincerely yours,

Dear Mr. Murrow:

As the result of a two week visit to Cyprus last February, I have become interested in the petition of Cyprus for self-determination. I have completed a great deal of research on the matter and feel quite strongly about the justice of the desire to throw off colonial rule.

Realizing your great interest in American foreign policy and in colonialism, I am writing this letter to ask if you would have a few minutes to talk to my uncle, George Rossides, who is here from Cyprus as an official member of their "unofficial" delegation to the United Nations. The United Nations General Assembly voted in December to postpone "for the time being" the discussion of Cyprus. The reason given by the United States in not supporting the principle of self-determination was that now is not an opportune time. My uncle feels, and I concur with him strongly, that the United States is sacrificing its prestige in Greece, the Near East and the world needlessly by retreating from the support of self-determination, and backing unnecessary colonial rule. He would be pleased to answer any questions you may have. He is planning to sail for Cyprus about January 20th.

I realize that you are extremely busy and therefore please answer this inquiry only if you are able to fit my uncle into your schedule. In the event you are tied up I shal take the liberty of contacting you for an appointment after January 20th.

Respectfully yours,

Gene Rossides

Dear Mr. Roth:

Thank you for your letter of April 25th.

I have considered your proposal that we televise a "Missing Heir Party" on one of my programs. Since we are pretty well committed to covering certain subjects up to the end of this season, I see no possibility of following your proposal at this time, but would like to thank you for your thoughtful suggestion.

Sincerely yours,

Dear Mr. Murrow:

Furthering my telephone conversation with your office on Friday (?), may I bring to your personal attention the proposal as mentioned on the telephone, of your televising a "Missing Heir Party".

The specific story that I have in mind that could be used by you, deals with an Italian immigrant who came to this country years ago and started shining shoes for a living. When he died, he left over $800,000, and left a will which was invalid, in that the legatees had pre-deceased him. The search began for his distant cousins and my research went back over a period of approximately 170 years. I finally located all of his cousins, who are sharing on a per capita and per stirpes basis. The decree has been signed and the various clients that we represent who were located by this office are getting $20,000 each on a partial distribution. Final account has not been rendered because of taxes, but I estimate that our clients will receive about a quarter of a million dollars.

In a few weeks time these funds will be available to the heirs. I felt that if such a show were to be done at all, depending upon your interest, that the time to televise it would be at the time that we deliver the checks to each of the distributees, and as far as programming was concerned, I thought that if we could get together most of the heirs that are local, it would pack a lot of human interest.

As you may or may not be aware, I am responsible for having in the past 19 years located thousands of heirs to millions of dollars, and who were located in various parts of the world. Some cases have been settled in a matter of weeks, whereas one took as long as eight years. The Park Avenue resident or the Bowery bum have an equal chance of collecting inheritances unknown to them, and throughout America there are several million missing people who have several billion dollars due them in unclaimed assets.

Mr. Edward R. Murrow April 25, 1955

Billy Rose, in his syndicated column, called me the "heir conditioner", which in fact I suppose is right, for my business is heir conditioning.

You may be further interested in knowing that I recently completed the genealogy of a branch of the Roosevelt family that had never been accomplished. The research in connection with this matter took over four years, and a copy of the same is now in the Franklin D. Roosevelt library at Hyde Park, as well as at the Congressional Library of Congress, who acknowledged the same as a valuable addition to its collections. I might further mention that Dale Carnegie found my work so interesting that after he wrote the first column about me, the thousands of persons who contacted him inspired him to write not one but four more syndicated columns.

Of all the people who appeared on "We, the People", I believe I received more fan mail than anyone who had ever appeared, having received upward of 10,000 letters.

I would appreciate hearing from you in the near future, and congratulations on your wonderful show.

Sincerely yours,

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH OF TED ROTH

Ted Roth, whose business for the past twenty years has been tracking down the missing, and who is known internationally as an expert in finding the missing, has perhaps located as many missing-persons as anyone in the United States. Each missing-person located was not the usual missing-person case, but in actuality a person who had disappeared anywheres from ten to one hundred-fifty years ago. The research and detection involved in locating each of these persons cover the span of the number of years where the person had last been heard from. In one specific case the last known names and addresses of thirty-two people who were sought as missing was in the year 1811. After seven years of work and litigation, the heirs, five generations removed, were located by Mr. Roth in thirty-one states of the United States of America. He was the first person to have ever accomplished the liquidation of that particular corporation. Thousands of persons have been traced by Ted Roth, and millions of dollars have been restored to them as a result of such investigations.

Bringing people and money together, tracing family skeletons, andlining up genealogies that have been many feet and length, has been the unusual occupation of this tracer. Ninety-nine percent of the cases solved by him were those in which many other persons had failed, and where he had succeeded. The trials and tribulations of finding missing heirs have been far too numerous to write about, but it can be said that every possible human emotion has entered into the tracking down of these people. Well over one billion dollars lies idle in the United States and remains unclaimed, because contrary to the belief that Mr. Roth finds money for people, he actually locates the assets and then traces the claimants entitled thereto.

Born in Brooklyn, his early ambition was to become a criminal lawyer. The depression made that unpractical, and a near allied field was entered into instead. A graduate criminologist, he finds no love for criminal work even though in World War II he served both in the United States and abroad with the Military Police, and subsequently became an agent for the Criminal Investigation Division of the United States Army. During such service he handled all types of criminal matters, ranging from rape to murder, but after five years' service was very anxious to resume locating missing heirs and doing good for others, in lieu of being a trouble-shooter. He is presently listed in Who's Who in the East, and has enjoyed many radio and television appearances, nad has been publicized in the press and magazines by such people as Billy Rose, Dale Carnegie, John Cameron Swayze, Sidney Fields, and other notable writers. Approximately one million people have written or called upon him for advice as to how to find the money that they are looking for, but the stock answer is: "I find missing people, and not sunken treasure". Dale Carnegie found he work so fascinating that he wrote five syndicated columns about this man-behind-the-scenes. As E. V. Durling wrote Mr. Roth once, "You certainly have your work cut out for you--it makes what is ordinarily called research appearlike child's play." As Dale Carnegie said: "The wonderful work you are doing". Many testimonials hang in the office of the investigater from some of the biggest writers in the country, attesting to the valuable work and services performed, and commenting that had it not been for this work, the heirs never could have taken into possession the funds that they were entitled to.

A recent accomplishment was in the completing of the Henry Helland Roosevelt genealogy, dating back to 1825, and which remained an unchartered branch of the late president's family until three and a half years of work by Mr. Roth completed the same. The Library of Congress forwarded an engraved diploma acknowledging the "valued addition to its collection".

Of all the people that appeared on the radio program "We, the People", Ted Roth, who drew over 10,000 letters, received more fan mail than anyone who had appeared on that program. The interest on the part of the public having to do with locating the missing heirs is in Mr. Roth's opinion more so than any other field of work, simply because they say to themselves "Here's a man who can do something for me". Paraphrasing Billy Rose, who termed him the "heir conditioner", that is what Mr. Roth has been doing for all these years. He estimates that he has performed about 25,000 investigations. Some cases have taken him but a few minutes to solve, and others have taken many years. He has received as little as $5.55 for a six-day investigation, and more than $10,000 for a four-minute investigation.

Dear Paul:

Many thanks for your letter of April 28th.

It was good hearing from you again, and I'm sorry to have missed you when you were here.

I wish I could write the piece you suggest, but I just can't do it. I have found this season that my crowded radio and television schedule leaves me little time for extra-curricular activities.

Thanks again for writing.

My dear Ed,

I am very sorry I was unable to be in touch with you when I was in New York recently for a few days, but I knew that Harry Watt was already a visitor under your auspices and I am sure your time, as always, must have been more than fully occupied. Had I been able to see you, I would have asked you what I now put in the form of a letter.

The Focal Press Ltd., London, is to publish a book to be called "Working in Television" as a successor to its publication some years ago "Working in Films". In the words of the publisher, "This is meant to be a practical book presenting actual experience and well-balanced views. It should tell simply and in terms of practical experience what the qualifications are which work on television requires, what the jobs consist of, and how the prospects of individual careers appear today."

The publisher has asked me to act as Editor to the book and in that capacity I am inviting contributions from about twenty television people, some on the staff of the BBC, some in Commercial Television, others in television overseas, to cover various aspects of television production and transmission. Each contributor will be commissioned by the publisher to write his or her piece of about 2000 to 2500 words in length.

As Editor of the book, I would like to ask if you would care to contribute a piece of between 2000 and 2500 words on the subject of public affairs in Television. No one would be better qualified than yourself to write a contribution for our book on this aspect of television. If you agree, I should very much like your MS in duplicate by the end of May, if that is possible ? Perhaps you would also send with it some details as to yourself, so that I may add a short paragraph under your name which would head up your particular section.

I know how dreadfully busy you are, but it would be a great contribution to the book if you could agree to do this. Other contributors whom you may know are Max Liebman (Variety), Bob Wade (Design), Harry McMahan (The Creative Team for the Television Commercial), Peter Dimmock (BBC Outside Broadcasts), Richard Levin (BBC Design) and others.

Should you agree to do this, I will ask the Managing Director of Focal Press Ltd. to communicate with you direct with regard to the business side of the matter.

Yours sincerely,

Paul Rotha

Dear Ed;

Your Granger - Simmons - Russell show was great.

Since I spent a few bob helping build the rehabilitation hospital on the East River, you can understand why I love you for the Russell portion. Have a couple of pals with one arm who use their remaining fingers to scratch their head. Marge and I got a big howl when Russell did exactly that with one of his metal flippers. Lots of guts, and I bet he has put a lot back in other guys.

Thanks for seeing Joe and by now I trust you know he is with John Daly at A.B.C.

All of the best.

And me, I love you too, but for a different reason - always you will be enshrined in my heart as the man who offered to send our Philip and Joe through school while Louis was in service. They turned out great, one suma and the other magna.

Dear Mr. Murrow:

At the outset, I would like to commend you on your outstanding work in the field of public education. It takes a great deal of mental self-assurance to be able to present the type of program you have originated. Your programs though simply presented, show an abundance of thoughtful preparation. Though they are presented in a simple way, the main strong point is the lack of evident editing. This is truly a tribute to C.B.S., to Mr. Fred W. Friendly and lastly and I suspect most strongly to you. I would like to encourage you and your most talented staff to continue with this most excellent work of bringing to light some of the shadowed and beclouded problems of our times.

Your time is valuable, as I consider mine tobe, and therefore, I shall consume very little more, enough to say that I am enclosing a Swivel Trigger Shoe of my own design for your use as I know you are interested in shooting. It is made to fit the Win. M70 and Woodsman T.M. and is made in other sizes if these do not fit. It should improve your shooting either in the field or on the range. Good luck again,

Dear Doctor Cutter:

Received your answer dated May 17th, and I have since come up with some additional information that may be of great interest to you.

The late Doctor MacKenzie had an associate, Dr. William B. Griggs, who at the present time is Professor Emritus of Materia Medica at Hahnemann Medical College here in Philadelphia. Dr. Griggs has specialized in Pediatrics for 65 years and was chief Pediatrition of the Broad Street Childrens Hospital during the Polio epidemic of 1916. At that time, his ward was the repository of the worst Bulbar cases (over 200 of them), and he did not lose one child.

When I showed your letter to Dr. Griggs, he in turn showed me some correspondence from Robert T. Stanton, Jr., of the Rystan Company in Mt. Vernon, N.Y., and Dr. Gustav Martin of National Drug, indicating their interest in a Polio Prophylactic he has been using for all these years with absolute safety and in addition, it is something that is taken orally.

At present, he is preparing a protocol for Dr. John F. Enders of Harvard for the evaluation of his preparation in comparison with the Salk Vaccine and Gamma-Globulin. Last year Dr. Griggs ran his own experiment using Rhesus animals at which time each group was given the different prophylactics and after 72 hours they were all injected in the kidney region with a solution made from the macerated cord of a Polio victim. All the animals died with the exception of those that had been given Dr. Grigg's preparation.

I told Dr. Griggs that I thought your organization could really do something with his preparation in view of all the censure you were unjustly exposed to. Furthermore, in view of the fact that it is a patentable product, I thought that he should submit it for the best proposition.

Very truly yours,

E. Maxie Sarnoff

CANCER VACCINE

To the Editor of The Inquirer:

YOUR editorial article titled, "Next, a Cancer Vaccine," presents a rightfully optimistic picture towards the conquest of this terrible affliction. This is as it should be, for investigators of our past medical history will find in the "Aphorisms of Hippocrates," the father of scientific medicine, the immutable law, "Like cures Like."

Even before Jenner's discovery of cowpox, Paracelsus, the great 16th century physician, perceived this law with his pronouncement, "Let Mercury cure things mercuric" indicating the treatment for syphillis.

GOING further along this line of thought, the remarkable Professor E. von Bering, the discoverer of the diptheria and tetanus antitoxin, was the first to detect the only flaw in this type of therapy. This flaw he indicated was the size of the dose. He wondered as to how small a dose of medicine could be and still have potency, insofar as its prophylactic action was concerned. Through experimentation he reasoned that no immunizing dose could be too small. Physicists could explain this readily by their axiom that "matter can never be destroyed" despite its continual division. This, of course, has been demonstrated more than ever by our nuclear scientists, by their work on the atom bomb.

Herein lies the solution to the Salk Vaccine difficulties. The vaccine in itself is right because the principle is sound, having been substantiated by the great medical men of the past. The late Dr. George W. MacKenzie of Philadelphia, in a paper read before the O.O. and L. section of the A.M.A. in 1916, stated in effect about vaccines: "If the dose is not too large for the patient's vitality to withstand, he will react against the extra load, following which there develops a favorable reaction (positive phase) or immunization.

IN VIEW of all these facts, the criticisms leveled at all those involved in the Salk Vaccine project are wrong. This will yet prove to be one of the great landmarks in medicine, provided unprejudiced medical minds in a free atmosphere will compare and analyze all the facts before them, both present and past, towards the ultimate goal of health and happiness.

THE TOYNBEE HERESY

By ABBA EBAN

Ambassador of Israel to the United States

Address Delivered at the Israel Institute-

Yeshiva University in New York

Editor's Note

This is the full text of an address delivered by Ambassador Abba Eban at the Israel Institute-Yeshiva University (Amsterdam Ave. & 187th St., New York City) on January 18, 1955.

THE TOYNBEE HERESY

I come before you tonight not in any diplomatic capacity but rather as a student of history and letters, seeking a brief respite from the claims of contemporary affairs. The subject before us is however not unrelated to the urgent issues of Israel's destiny; and I do not feel that I am deserting the immediate arena in favor of an ivory tower of academic detachment. The place which Israel occupies in the pride and love of our generation has not been won solely by the achievements of this decade. It is an eminence earned largely by historic repute. The emergence of modern Israel is an event conceived in the highest dimensions of history. It is the result of one of the most tenacious passions in the records of human action. It marks a triumph of faith and will over the calculations of rational chance. It symbolises the survival, and perhaps the renewed florescence, of mankind's oldest culture. More than any other national revival in modern times, it has been a primary theme in the moral history of a whole generation, sharply contested, agitated, and discussed as a theme of conscience, as well as of international politics.

Thus if the bright image of Israel's resurgence is distorted, if this historic process is held up to ridicule, if the stature of this event is degraded – if our new birth of freedom is portrayed as a squalid and bloodthirsty conspiracy, then Israel loses a priceless asset of her security and honor. There is no state in the modern world whose progress has been more dependent on idealistic and moral postulates. A response to an assault upon Israel's historic repute is thus not a mere exercise in academic controversy. It affects the very essence of Israel's destiny in life and thought.

It is against this background that I come to discuss a view of Israel's history which has recently been proclaimed with the authority of an impressive name in contemporary scholarship.

In order to define and rebut the heresy, it is necessary to recall the orthodox historiography from which the heresy deviates.

The Traditional View

The writers of Jewish history portray the national experience of a people in a continuous narrative of four thousand years. The experience in antiquity is well-documented and preserved, clad in the rainment of superb literary artistry, articulate and coherent in all its parts, and drawing substantive confirmation from the recent discoveries of archaeology. At the center of this experience stands the revelation to Israel of a concept of history in terms of progress. This people of shepherds and farmers, in a small country on the shores of the eastern Mediterranean, evolved ideas of startling originality which have remained an unattainable standard for mankind across the gulf of generations. First came the doctrine of the moral choice. The pre-Jewish civilizations were gripped by religions of fatalism, determinism and resignation. They saw human life in relentless cycles coming back to a starting point in darkness and chaos. They denied the concept that the will and conscience of man governed the world's future. Mysterious and inscrutable forces of Nature or of Supernature disposed of human destiny by arbitrary and superstitious laws. Man was the passive object, not the conscious agent of historic processes.

Against this determinism and resignation there arose the revolutionary concept of Judaism in the realm of the individual conscience: בחור בטוב ומאוס ברע. The capacity of choice between good and evil could determine the destiny of human life, in accordance with a coherent system of moral thought. This concept of the power of moral choice was the authentic and original contribution of Judaism to the question of purpose in individual life.

The societies which preceded the Jewish Kingdoms were dominated by concepts of permissible exploitation. Man was helpless against the adverse forces of Nature and against the cruelties of his innate avarice. Against the doctrine of social resignation, there arose the Hebrew idea of social justice. The primary theme was Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself ואהבת לרעך כמוך. From this notion of solidarity in human relations came the concept of moral law applicable to societies, as well as to individuals.

Spreading out into its third circle of influence, the Hebrew ideal attacked the prevailing concept of war as a natural state of the universe, a part of mankind's very nature and character. Three thousand years ago the Prophets proclaimed the doctrine of universal peace. Nation shall not lift up the sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more.

These were the triple foundations of the Hebrew ideal: individual morality, social justice, universal peace. Historians have portrayed their development as illustrated in the experience of a people who, believing themselves to be the responsible custodians of these ideals, conserved their integrity and union even against the disparate forces of dispersion and exile. They conserved this union and identity not for their own sake, but in order to maintain trusteeship over these revolutionary ideals. The narrative goes on to describe the break-up of the Jewish Kingdoms, the dispersion of its citizens, and the subsequent struggle to preserve a sense of nationality and spiritual mission without the political and territorial attributes of statehood.

The Doctrine of Restoration

In every appraisal of Jewish history particular attention has been devoted to the doctrine of Restoration. With unique tenacity this people maintained the theory of its exile as a temporary state to be succeeded by a reunion between the people, the land and the language out of whose original coalescence the Hebrew revelation was born. True, the Jewish people continued its creative course in many scenes and capacities after the loss of national independence. But the fact remains that it was in conditions of separate national independence in Israel that the Hebrew mind rose to levels of creativeness which it never subsequently attained.

The restoration is described by Jewish historians both as a Divine will and as a human duty. The Divine promise decreed that this people should be restored; it was, therefore, its own duty not only to dream but also labor for that redemption. As Jewish history enters the eighteenth and nineteenth century, the doctrine of the Restoration assumes concrete form as a response to homelessness. The absence of an independent physical center for the Jewish people results in the danger both of physical extinction and of spiritual assimilation. The problem of survival is seen as a function of Israel's capacity to emerge from the handicap and reproach of homelessness. This theme dominates Jewish history at the turn of the century, when Zionism becomes the central collective purpose of the Jewish people. Finally there comes the great crescendo, a symphonic climax with overtones of tragedy and grandeur, of horror and salvation. The deepest agony is succeeded by the sudden illumination of hope. The massacre of Jewish communities in Europe is followed, within a single decade, by an act of salvation through the restoration of Israel's sovereignty, the salvage of its authentic personality and the assurance of its national and cultural survival. This last climax, a fantastic transition from the depths of paralyzing weakness to new peaks of sovereign opportunity, is played out on a broad universal canvas with the international conscience actively engaged. Twice within a single decade the world tribunal recognises the right of the Jewish people to the restoration of its homeland. The recognition itself creates new incentives for the renaissance.

The themes which I have described in very broad and, therefore, approximate strokes, do not vary considerably between the work of one historian and another. Jewish historians naturally stress the undying validity of the original Jewish heritage, while Christian scholars see their own civilization evolving in progress from the Judaic ideal. But even the writings of most Christian historians pay pious tribute to the affirmative qualities of the Hebrew spirit and to the unique achievement of Jewish survival. They, too, revere the Hebrew tradition as the parent source of their own Christian civilization. As apostles of faith and opponents of determinism, they rely upon Israel's resurgence as a striking lesson in the potency of the human will. A dream which had no ostensible prospect of realisation was carried to fulfilment against all calculations of material chance. There had seemed to be no historical prospect a few decades ago that this people could establish its sovereignty in a land coveted by more powerful nationalisms and imperialisms; that it could overcome the diversive factors of its exile in a measure sufficient to restore national unity; that it could revive the original medium of its culture; or that it could secure international recognition of the link between the Jewish people and its ancient homeland – a concept which a short time ago had no place in the jurisprudence of nations. In these circumstances, any historian of unprejudiced insight would see Israel's rise as a vindication of the spiritual impulse in human history, a crushing argument in the eternal discussion between the advocates of faith and the adherents of materialistic or deterministic doctrines of history which deny the human will any status as a governing factor in human destiny.

I have stated some of the orthodox attitudes in Jewish historiography. They are not free from challenge or controversy. It is not difficult to find moments, or even whole generations, in which this people fell short of its elevated standards. There are those who argue that other currents of human thought overtook and broadened the original insights of the Hebrew mind. It is possible to advocate but not possible to prove this theory of improvement. But a generally affirmative approach to the history of the Jewish people can be discerned in all but the most eccentric historical writing until Toynbee. Indeed, the attempts to discredit the Jewish historic process have, until this year, been confined to those who have sought an academic rationalisation for religious or political hostility.

Significance of Toynbee's Revolt

We cannot, therefore, fail to regard Professor Toynbee's analysis as a significant event in contemporary scholarship. Here we have no partial or selective criticism of the Jewish historic performance. We have an almost total negation of anything affirmative in the entire record. The attack is not alone upon the credit of contemporary Israel. There is a vehement assault on the antecedents of modern Israel reaching back into the mists of antiquity. Rising up in revolt against orthodox history, Professor Toynbee, in a grandiose framework of a study of the rise and fall of civilizations, presents the story of Israel over thousands of years as a grotesque psychic aberration leading to a squalid tragedy of historic injustice.

The Fossil Theory

The Toynbee thesis begins with the picture of a "Syriac community" which recognizes the supremacy of "a provincial and jealous god" marked by fanatical vengefulness and exclusiveness. There is something in this provincial and jealous god, perhaps the very ferocity of his exclusiveness and fanaticism which gives him supremacy in his contemporary world of ideas. But soon, everything which is of affirmative value in the Hebrew concept of divinity is inherited by the higher religion of Christianity, thus leaving the Jewish mission fulfilled and exhausted.

In this part of Professor Toynbee's writing there is a marked reluctance to recognise any ideas as authentically Jewish, except the quality of fanaticism. This is singled out as the most typical of all the Hebrew qualities. Indeed, the Jewish people is awarded the original copyright. Whenever there is a description of extreme brutality, it is described as being "Judaic" in character. The persecutions of the Visigoths are portrayed as being of typically "Judaic" fanaticism, and Professor Toynbee finds no records of religious persecution before the Maccabees, who thus became the historical parents of forcible proselytism.

There is a reluctance, if not a refusal, to recognise divine and human love as indispensable and central themes of the Hebrew tradition. The domination of love is represented as a spectacular deviation achieved by Christianity from the original concept of the provincial and jealous god. The three circles of Hebrew morality — individual conscience, social justice and universal peace — would not present themselves at all to any reader dependent on Toynbee for his insight into the essence of the Hebrew ideal.

From this provincialism and tribalism the Jewish people, having outlived its mission almost in its infancy, lingers on in Toynbee's world of history as "a fossil remnant." The word "fossil" fascinates this writer. He rolls it lovingly over his tongue with the complacent air of one who has coined an immortal aphorism. Statisticians will be delighted to count the number of occasions in which the Jewish people is described as a "fossil" remnant in the eight volumes. Dr. Toynbee will not tell us what he means. The concept is never defined. It is indeed a basic weakness of his work that it evades the definition of its fundamental terms. But the word "fossil" has a scientific definition. It denotes something petrified which retains its original shape and semblance without the breath of life. The mollusc or shell lingers on eternally, while the spirit which once gave it the glory of animation has long since departed.

Now, the doctrine of the fossil is the very core of the Toynbee heresy. If Israel was a fossil centuries ago, then its survival is certainly an archaism and its restoration is a grotesque paradox. On the other hand, if the concept of Judaism as something petrified and embalmed cannot be sustained, then it is difficult to challenge the right of a sentient living spirit to seek survival and restoration.

Prof. Toynbee fails, indeed declines, to substantiate the fossil theory, despite the fact that it is the absolute premise and starting point of all his subsequent judgments.

But the fossil, not having read Dr. Toynbee's eight volumes, is unaware of its own petrefaction. It clings to its sense of mission, and even strives for national restoration. For Toynbee, this is a rebellion against the orthodox Jewish tradition which decrees that the restoration, if it comes at all, must proceed exclusively from the Divine initiative. Toynbee portrays the movement for the restoration of Jewish nationhood as a usurpation by human beings of a destiny which can only be righteously envisaged as the work of the Creator. The fossil remnant, instead of accepting what is called the doctrine of "political quietism" and waiting in resignation for the Divine purpose to unfold itself, has presumed impiously to take the law into its own hands and to conceive Jewish restoration as a process of human activity. In attributing political quietism and resignation to orthodox Judaism, Professor Toynbee becomes an unexpected and explicit adherent of Agudath Israel. This movement is mentioned with a straight face several times as the embodiment of the authentic tradition; Orthodox Judaism, decrees Prof. Toynbee, in a mood of Rabbinical dogmatism, requires acceptance of Diaspora until, in God's good time, if at all, a Divine initiative, unsupported by human revolt, will bring about the restoration together with Messianic redemption. The natural Jewishness is the condition of Diaspora. The return is an archaism, a paradox, an impiety, and an injustice.

Direct quotation will prove that the principles of this heresy have not been stated by Professor Toynbee in terms less drastic than those which I have ascribed to him. Moreover, the story is told with a vehemence, a moral passion, a subjective indignation, rare in historical writing and indeed without parallel elsewhere in Toynbee's work. The adjectives are those of journalism, of political polemics. The writer is not content to describe. He insists also on the capacity to judge and condemn. It seems vitally important to him that the reader should despise many of the processes and the most striking recent results of the immemorial Jewish story. In the end, Professor Toynbee too takes his story to a climax — but not to a climax of chivalrous triumph, of incredible recuperation of will power vanquishing material obstacles and impediments. His is a climax full of tragedy, pathos and paradox. The torment of Jewry under Nazism is described in terms of violent and vehement indignation. But this indignation forms the bridge to the blasphemous conclusion that the immeasurable torment of Jewry under Nazism is "less tragic" than the circumstances in which 750,000 Arabs are homeless, though alive, upon the soil and the territory of the independent Arab States. Finally, the State of Israel is portrayed as a caricature of all the imperfections of society, a squalid little Ghetto without grace or meaning, the abode of "a Janus figure, part American farmer technician, part Nazi sicarius". With this chivalrous pat on our shoulder we are sent on our way down the road to damnation on Judgment Day.

The Hebrew Divinity

Let me vindicate the accuracy of my summary in Professor Toynbee's own words. Here is how he begins with a description of the Jewish concept of Divinity:

> "It is not, of course, surprising to find these two traits of provincialism and exclusiveness displayed by Yahveh simultaneously. A God who keeps to his own domain may be expected to warn other Gods off it. What is surprising, and even repellent, at any rate at first sight, is to see Yahveh continuing to exhibit an unabated intolerance towards the rivals with whom he courts a conflict when, after the overthrow of the Kingdoms of Israel and Judah, and the establishment of the Syriac universal state, this God of two highland principalities steps out into the wider world and aspires like his neighbors to win for himself the worship of all mankind"

Provincialism and exclusiveness, then, rather than Oneness, love and justice are the dominant characteristics of the Hebrew God. Provincialism is diagnosed by Professor Toynbee in his attack on the doctrine of the chosen people. This concept is described as the arrogation of a privilege, not as the acceptance of responsibility and obligation. It is, in fact, defined by Professor Toynbee in terms of a narcissistic self-idealization. He writes:

> "The most notorious historical example of this idealization of an ephemeral self is the error of the Jews which is exposed in the New Testament. In the period of their history, which began in the infancy of the Syriac civilization and which culminated in the age of the Prophets, the people of Israel and Judah raised themselves head and shoulders above the Syriac peoples by rising to a monotheistic conception of religion. Keenly conscious of their spiritual treasure, they allowed themselves to be betrayed into an idealization of this notable but transitory stage in their spiritual growth. They had indeed been gifted with unparalleled spiritual insight but after having divined a truth which was absolute and eternal they allowed themselves to be captivated by a relative and temporary half-truth. They persuaded themselves that Israel's discovery of the one true God had revealed Israel itself to be God's chosen people; and this half-truth inveigled them into a fatal error of looking upon a momentary spiritual eminence as a privilege conferred upon them by God in an everlasting covenant. Brooding on a talent which they had perversely sterilized by hiding it in the earth, they rejected the still greater treasure which God offered them in the coming of Jesus of Nazareth."

My criticism of this passage is directed not, of course, against Toynbee's reverence for the Christian revelation, but against his invidious definition of a Jewish doctrine for the sake of its debasement. He states without proof that the doctrine of Israel's selection is the assertion of exclusive membership in a restricted club. He ignores the true essence of this idea, which is the acceptance of a burden of obligation heavier than that carried by other peoples who were not the original custodians of the inspired revelation. The concept of Israel's choice is one of humility, not of arrogance. The selection is a burden, not a grace. There is a vast exegesis on this theme in Rabbinical literature. But Professor Toynbee need not have gone beyond the first documents which expound the theme of Israel's selection –

"You only have I known of all the families of the earth; therefore I will visit upon you all your iniquities."

The Fossil Again

From this description of a provincial self-idealisation and the assertion of a privileged status, Professor Toynbee goes on to grapple with the mystery of Jewish survival. He has no device except the metaphor of the fossil:

"The Jews and the Pharisees are fossils of the Syriac society as it was before the Hellenic intrusion upon the Syriac world," and again,

> "A number of fossils in Diaspora have preserved their identity through a devotion to religious rights and a proficiency in commerce and finance."

This doctrine of Jewish survival as a result of an excessive ritualism and of financial astuteness is disturbing akin to the diagnosis of anti-Semitic historians, from whom Toynbee would justly claim dissociation. The economic history of the Jewish people is in fact a poignant record, with a ghastly volume of starvation and poverty. The legendary proficiency in commerce and finance is a characteristic which modern Israel has still failed to discover. But for Dr. Toynbee it is sufficient to assert these time-worn platitudes. It is not necessary to prove them. He rules by negative implication against any idea that Jewish survival is the result of an affirmative spiritual dedication. It is by commercial shrewdness and rigid ceremonial orthodoxy, that the fossil survives. There is more of Shylock than of Isaiah or Maimonides in this prototype.

> "At the present moment they survive as a mere Diaspora; and the petrified religion, which still so potently holds the scattered members of these communities together, has lost its message to mankind and has hardened into a fossil of the extinct Syriac society."

A fossil cannot create or even interpret original ideas. Thus by his very definition Professor Toynbee disposes negatively of the entire post-Biblical Jewish culture, through medieval Hebrew philosophy and poetry, right up to the achievements and insights of Hebrew literature and scholarship in the present day. It is doubtful whether Professor Toynbee is equipped, linguistically or otherwise, to deny the breath of life or the spark of inspiration to this vast literature. But the beloved slogan of the fossil is, in fact, judgment on the ideas and writings of these many generations.

The Sanctity of Diaspora

That the natural state of the fossil is the Diaspora is another central theme in Professor Toynbee's heresy. Hear it in his own words:

> "The historic Jewry was the Diaspora and the distinctively Jewish gethos and institutions . . . A meticulous devotion to the Mosaic Law and a consummate virtuosity in commerce and finance were those which the Diaspora in the course of ages had wrought into social talismans endowing this geographically scattered community with a magic capacity for survival."

All would have been well, then, if this people had patiently accepted its petrified status. Unfortunately, however, the fossil revolted against its petrified nature, and this is the source of the paradox and the tragedy.

"So long as the Jewish Diaspora was content, bona fide, to leave the future of Palestine in the hands of God, the existing Christian and Moslem inhabitants of the promised land could afford to do likewise. And when the orthodox Jewish doctrine of an eventual repatriation of Jewry to Palestine through an act of God was thus accompanied by a traditional Jewish practice of political quietism, the doctrine, like a derivative Christian doctrine of the second coming of Christ, could be interpreted in crude Machievelian or Marxian terms as a psychological device, not for bringing to pass a far-off Divine event to which the whole creation moves, but for maintaining en attendant and ad infinitum the social confusion of a mundane community in Diaspora."

If you will allow me to translate that last passage into English, Prof. Toynbee says this: So long as the doctrine of the Restoration was held as a pious abstraction, with nothing done to fulfil it, the idea could exist harmlessly. But any attempt to put it into practice was bound to reveal its inherent contradictions and to lead to a climax of tragedy.

The Attack on the Restoration

It is a far cry from a fossil in diaspora to a robust modern nation in its original home. Professor Toynbee feels that the transition needs much explanation. He finds the explanation in a catchword. It is "archaism".

"Archaism, as we have seen in another context, is always a perilous pursuit. But it is most perilous of all when it is taken up by members of a community that is a fossil relic of a dead civilization, since the past to which the archaists have it in their power to cast back in such a case may be more sharply at variance with present realities than even the remotest past state of the society belonging to the living generations of the species."

Now, it is amply clear at this stage that Professor Toynbee harbors a fierce resentment against Jewish survival and still more against Jewish national restoration. The fossil whose lack of animation he has so authoritatively diagnosed keeps getting up and biting him in the ankle. All he can say is that the entire phenomenon is against the proper theory. His answer is not that the theory is wrong, but that the phenomenon is reprehensible. Thus, the tenacity with which the Jewish people worked for the Restoration invites Professor Toynbee's greatest indignation. It is here that he attacks the Restoration as a usurpation of the Divine Will. For a truly Divine objective must be carried out by the Almighty alone; and any effort to advance it by human effort is an impious rebellion against the Divine prerogative. Man may not busy himself in the reform of the world into the Kingdom of God.

To establish this analogy in another sphere, we might say that if social justice is a God-given ideal, then any human being who strives for social justice through political or economic organization is guilty of impious revolt against God's purpose, for he is denying the capacity of the Almighty, unaided by human agencies, especially fossilized ones, to bring about the realization of the ideal. Lest you think that this is an exaggeration, this very reduction ad absurdum actually occurs in Professor Toynbee's thesis:

"A Western-inspired archaism carried the twentieth century Zionist faction of a Jewish Diaspora back to the aims and ethos of the generation of Joshua. The consequent replacement of the traditional Jewish hope of an eventual Restoration of Israel to Palestine on God's initiative through the agency of a divinely inspired Messiah, by a Zionist movement working to establish a Jewish national state in Palestine on Jewry's initiative by mundane political and military means, had the same explosive effect as the contemporary replacement of the Christian hope of social justice to be inaugurated at the second coming of Christ, by a communist movement working to establish a mundane new dispensation by means of a world revolution."

This is too wonderful to be true. But it is there in black and white. Just as the human efforts to achieve Jewish restoration lead to the "impiety" of Zionism, so any attempt to achieve a social milennia by human struggle is a distortion of Christianity and may lead to such aberrations as Communism. It is faith to cherish a Divine vision; it is "impiety" to stumble forward towards its fulfilment.

We can see how the love of slick analogy, the most perilous occupational hazard of a historian, has gripped Prof. Toynbee. Having related the dream of Jewish Restoration to a usurpation akin to Communism, he goes on to prove that traditional attachment of Israel to its original soil is a form of Fascism. Observe how this record tour de force is accomplished. First, it is stated that the Jewish people's title to the soil of Eretz Israel is based "on the physical grounds that they are a master race in virtue of having Abraham for their father." This definition of the theory of the link between land and people in terms of "master race" is stated as a fact. The attachment is not a cultural tradition, it is not a spiritual link, it is not a mystic unity of the mind between the people of Israel and the physical conditions in which it underwent the immortal Biblical experience. It is the concept of blood and soil and herrenvolk. This is the basis of our claim, and by this "the Zionist is unwittingly testifying that he has been ensnared by the lure of a post-modern Western Gentile racialism in which a late modern Western Gentile nationalism had denounced itself through the self-exposure of a self-caricature as being the naked neo-paganism that it was."

In simpler language, (for Toynbee's turgidity of language is one of the most unprepossessing features of his study), Zionists claim Eretz Israel on the grounds that they are a master race descended from Abraham: This shows that they are ensnared by the Nazi theory of the herrenvolk: Therefore Zionism is kindred to Nazism. There is a little difficulty about anachronism here, since the Jewish teaching on the relationship of Israel to Eretz Israel has been fully and sublimely developed for twenty centuries before Nazism existed to ensnare anybody. But if it is convenient to portray this link as the derivative of the Blood and Soil concept of the Nazi ideologists, let convenience prevail.

The passion for analogies between events and ideas separated by centuries and continents marks Toynbee's greatest weakness as a historian. Dr. Talmon has pointed out that there is nothing in his work of that particular intimacy which marks the authentic historians, who select a small sector of the scene, a single period or a single land, and immerse themselves in that specialized realm until they become a part of its very breath. Here the canvas is vast and broad. The aim is to say something about everything but not to know everything about anything. The effect is secured by grandiose dimensions. It is as though a painter in search of fame and repute were to seek it not by the intrinsic quality of his work, but by painting upon a canvas physically vaster than any work of art before. The absence of specialization, and the insistence upon generalized slogans is a primary weakness of Toynbee's scholarship. Nowhere does the superficiality become as unattractive as in these glib and invidious analogies which relate the Jewish dream of restoration to Communism and Nazism in turn.

Toynbee on Modern Israel

Against this background it is easy to predict how Dr. Toynbee will proceed from his historical premises to his contemporary appraisals of modern Israel. There is no purpose in discussing his modern picture, except by reference to his definitions of pre-Israel Jewish history. Never has the Hebrew tradition been described by any historian in terms of such profound disrespect. The rejection of Israel's rebirth is an organic consequence of his theories concerning the "fossilised relic", the "exhausted mission" and the impiety of any revolt against the "natural state of diaspora" or the duty of "political quietism."

If Zionism is a usurpation of the Divine province, then there is nothing more that need be said against it.

> "The mystical feeling convicted the Zionists of an importunity which verged upon impiety in their attempt to take out of God's hands the fulfilment of God's promise to restore Israel to Palestine upon God's own initiative."

Note that here again, the basic premise is stated without proof. It is affirmed ex cathedra to be the Jewish orthodox doctrine that the Restoration must proceed from the Divine initiative without human aid. There are, of course, countless refutations of that premise in orthodox Hebrew literature. It is true that the Hebrew doctrine of history describes the restoration as a Divine purpose. But it also describes it as a purpose which human effort should strive to accelerate. Indeed, Judaism rejects Dr. Toynbee's persistent division between the Divine Will and human action. He constantly sees these two concepts in terms of antithesis. In Judaism, except for the mystical heresies, it is deemed that if something is willed by God, then it is the duty of man in his material life to strive for its fulfilment.

Toynbee's theory of "importunity" brings him smoothly to the events of 1948 and the description of the processes which gave birth to the State of Israel. The Zionists had jogged the Divine elbow to the brink of great events.

Three causes are cited by Prof. Toynbee for this event which he admits to be unusual.

First, the strength of American Jewry. You may be fossils but you are very formidable fossils and despite your petrified character, you have the rights of franchise and political influence.

Second, the genocide committed by Nazism of which he writes with deep qualified indignation; Third, the cold war. These are the three components of Israel's rebirth. By them, and by them alone, does Dr. Toynbee seek to explain the inopportune revival of the fossil, its emergence from its "natural state of diaspora," its advance through "archaism" and "usurpation" to its present tragic lease of nationhood.

Instead of discussing what Toynbee says about modern Israel, it would be instructive to recount what he omits. He omits any treatment of the theme in terms of international equity. The rise of Jewish independence, side by side with a far broader Arab emancipation, is the essence of this problem from the viewpoint of comparative international equity. This is ignored. The historical material is dealt with in terms of British and American Realpolitik; and in the British and American pro-Zionist traditions he allows for no ethical or moral consideration at all. The British promise of 1917 was the product of a mistaken expediency; a bid for Jewish support in America and in the countries of the Central Powers. Similarly, domestic pressures, the reluctance of American Jews to allow Jews to immigrate to the United States for fear of anti-Semitism, and plain ignorance are the impulses behind American support. The Zionist theme in the idealistic literature of both Anglo-Saxon countries is not mentioned. There is no indication that there ever took place in the United Nations a discussion of Palestine from the viewpoint of self-determination. This judgment ruled that even as it is right for the Arabs to possess their empire, so it cannot be wrong for the Jewish people to enjoy the tranquil possession of its modest home. To all of us who took any part in that turbulent international controversy, it was clear that this contrast between the continental opportunities of Arab nationalism and the Jewish people's lack of any free domain determined the character of the discussion and its eventual outcome. Statesmen were simple-minded enough to believe that it would not be a cosmic tragedy if the Arab world made do with nine sovereign States, covering two million square miles; and that it would be a more authentic tragedy if every people were to be established in national freedom amongst those which had suffered the Nazi onslaught – except the people which had suffered the most. In ascribing to the United States and to Britain the responsibility for a blind tragedy of error, Toynbee entirely ignores these high themes, just as he ignores the part which small nations played in the judgments which helped Israel's rebirth. The fact that the first serious proposal for Jewish statehood came from a group of eight small countries against Great Power scepticism is not considered at all.

Cardinal Omissions of Fact

I do not dispute Professor Toynbee's right to argue with these international judgments, to deplore or regret them; but I cannot understand what concept of historical scholarship allows their complete suppression, the absence of any allusion to the chief milestones which led up to the results which he describes. And there is an even greater sensation in store. There is no war. Neither the Arab declaration of unofficial war on November 30, nor the historic document whereby, on May 15, the Arab States informed the United Nations of their intention to embark upon military intervention, is even mentioned. Since every residual problem affecting Arab-Israel relations is a function of the military clash of 1948, it is startling to find no record of the fact that the Arab rejection of Israel was put to the test of the sword. I could respect a historian who published these actions and then exonerated them; who said that the Arab States were justified morally or emotionally or historically in attempting by force to prevent Israel's emergence. But you would really have to look to George Orwell in his morbid vision of totalitarianism to find such a successful suppression of extant historical evidence. It is as though an historian of the first World War were not even to mention the assassination at Sarejevo and the invasion of Belgium, or if the chronicler of the Second World War were to mention neither the assault on Danzig and Poland in 1939, nor the bombing of Pearl Harbor in 1941. Even the more honest amongst the Nazi apologists do not attempt to deny these military facts. They may ascribe to them a legitimacy or a righteousness of motive, but they operate with the same material as the rest of us. Here the most explosive dramatic fact in recent Arab-Israel relations, namely the convergence of Arab armies on Israel and their repulse, is not even accorded the courtesy of record.

From this massive suppression we are bound to reach strange results. All of a sudden the Jews, a petrified fossil, without any international authority, usurping Divine purpose and rebelling against their own orthodoxy, launched themselves like a barbarian invasion upon a Holy Land with which they had nothing to do, wilfully drove out all the inhabitants and thereby committed an act of cruelty in the image of those of which they had been victims. The reason for this is that the Great Powers did not know of the existence of the Arab world. For example:

> "President Truman's personal susceptibility to this popular American confusion of mind and mixture of motives (it is an axiom of the Toynbee theory that the American mind is covered by large areas of generous imbecility—A.E.) might go far to explain presidential interventions in the Palestinian imbroglio which would have been utterly cynical if they had not been partially innocent-minded. The Missourian politician philanthropist's eagerness to combine expediency with charity by assisting the wronged and suffering Jews would have appeared to have been untempered by any awareness of the existence of wrongs and sufferings inflicted upon the Arabs."

The picture then is that in 1947, the United States was unaware of the existence of an Arab world, and therefore made a unilateral award of self-determination, never attempting to balance the Jewish claims against those of a sated Arab nationalism. The fact is that the State Department was almost as aware as Professor Toynbee of the existence of Arab interests. Nevertheless the determination was made: the eight or nine sovereignties for the Arabs, the single little home for the Jews. I do not quarrel with Professor Toynbee for not accepting this award, but I am puzzled by his disdainful refusal to discuss it.

Apart from its origins in Great Power politics, Israel, according to Toynbee, derived its statehood from the incentives, the compassion, the yearnings evoked by the Hitler persecution. The Nazi extermination of six million Jews was an evil thing, and Professor Toynbee uses some of his most violent adjectives in describing this tragedy. But it is not the greatest tragedy. The Nazi gentile's fall was less tragic than the Zionist Jew's.

> "On the Day of Judgment the gravest crime standing to the German National Socialist's account might be not that they had exterminated a majority of Western Jews, but that they had caused the surviving remnant of Jewry to stumble."

Now, this is one of the most extraordinary sentences in literature. First, let us note the reference to the Day of Judgment. This occurs more than once. Professor Toynbee is not merely the historian of the twentieth century; he is the Attorney-General of the Almighty upon the Day of Judgment. He knows already how the matter will appear in the eternal perspectives of history. And what is the "lesser tragedy?" The lesser tragedy is that six and a half million Jews including one million children, were exterminated and obliterated with all their life and institutions. They were butchered as cattle, cut off from their inheritance of life. A ghastly silence broods over these obscene ditches and incinerators. The shrieks of agony have died away; they are no problem for the United Nations. The potentialities within those millions, whatever they were, are lost to human destiny. This is, for Toynbee, a "lesser tragedy" than the fact that Arab governments have not yet been persuaded to give their kinsmen, on their own soil, the opportunities of liberty and progress which lie within their gift.

Ponder first upon the arithmetical equity. Assume that Arab refugees had undergone the fate of extermination and massacre of our own brethren in Europe. Why even then would the 750,000 killed have been a greater tragedy than the six million? But the true comparison is not of arithmetic. It is between death and life. The six million are dead. The 750,000, with all their suffering, are alive. But their aliveness is for Toynbee a greater tragedy than those irrevocable deaths. Moreover, they are alive on the soil of their kinsmen, on Arab lands, not in captivity; in countries which are free, emancipated, entitled – even exhorted – to give them homes, Arabic environment, Arabic national loyalty and sentiment. A broad future stretches before them if their own people will open the door of its heart. That is "more tragic" than the burning of our children in incinerators and the extermination of their parents in gas chambers!

The passion for analogy can never have run riot with more insidious or irreverent results. A writer of Christian faith stands before the most unfathomable agony of all generations and compares it with what is an admittedly grave hardship in a totally different and infinitely less tragic dimension. The one disaster is irrevocable, the other entirely within human alleviation; yet the former is "less tragic" than the latter. The death of the many is "less tragic" than the hardship, in survival, of the relatively few. The Nazi sum of deliberate massacre is not more heinous than the injury inflicted by Israel in a war for the defence of hearth and home. I am no authority, as Toynbee is, on the verdicts of Judgment Day but I cannot see how his cruel observations on the "lesser tragedy" can ever win forgiveness in a compassion less than Divine.

But when all is said and written, the State of Israel stands firm, and the pride of exaltation has come into the tents of Jacob everywhere. All that Professor Toynbee can do is to wish us ill. He genially sees American Jews and Israel becoming "progressively alienated" from each other. Your nourishment of Israel, the most remarkable outpouring of a voluntary public spirit, is written off in a niggardly spirit with a suggestion that you are being duped into submission "to taxation without representation" and will soon wake up to a more prudent and egocentric parsimony. After two thousand years the only people whose continuous historic memory comprehends all the cycles of civilization which Toynbee records, is reunited with its original inheritance. And Dr. Toynbee can only celebrate this wondrous consummation with the following tirade of invective:—

> "In its diminutiveness, its fanaticism, and its Ishmaelitish enmity with its neighbors, the new Zionist Israel in Palestine was a reproduction of the Modern Western national State that, in its faithfulness, verged on being a parody."

Toynbee on Nationalism

If there is any consolation, it is in the knowledge that we are being castigated in the name of all nation states. For Professor Toynbee regards national sovereignty as obsolete, and hankers after the more perfect system in which national identities were suppressed under the millet system of the Ottoman Empire.

> "The species of community (i.e. the nation State) of which this (namely Israel) was the youngest member was at last approaching its eclipse."

This is a typical confusion between historical fact and a Toynbeesque wish. The eclipse of nationalism by some supra-national federalism has been predicted so often that it is one of the platitudes of twentieth century writing. But, in fact, this very century is the triumphant epoch of the nation state, and the burial ground of broader associations and groupings. At least twenty separate nationhoods have been founded in the past few decades, mostly in Asia, while simultaneously the monocentric groupings have either been destroyed, like the Ottoman Empire and the Austro-Hungarian Empire, or have exchanged their dependence on a single centre for the looser liberty of separate orbits, as with the British Commonwealth, in which the nation state has inexorably claimed the institutional future. It is all very well to fulminate against "the antiquated patchwork of ghetto-like nation States," and to talk of an irresistible tide sweeping us back towards the Syriac institution of the millet, which is Toynbee's institutional ideal. But has the tide been so irresistible after all, in a generation in which "the species of community of which (Israel) was the youngest member" has been fruitful and multiplied to a degree which seemed inconceivable a few decades ago? Perhaps, it is because in our small way we disprove the great sweeping thesis about the "institutional future" not belonging "to the western institution of the national State" that we are called upon to bear these unfaithful wounds, inflicted without love. I doubt whether an analysis in which an inaccurate and hostile passion smothers any spark of human sympathy will supersede the traditional appraisal of Israel's history, including its modern resurgence, as one of the most exhilarating testimonies to the eternal gallantry of the unconquered human spirit.

Dear Ed and Fred:

I did not have the pleasure of seeing the October 26th SEE IT NOW broadcast "The Vice Presidency--the Great American Lottery," but I did have the pleasure of reading the script of the program which Mr. Stanton recently sent to me.

Please accept my hearty congratulations on this wonderful presentation on the very provocative Vice Presidency problem.

Things seem to be going much more smoothly in the poliomyelitis vaccine field than they did in earlier days this year. Our principal problems now are supply shortage and some slowness in seeking vaccination. We expect that to change progressively as 1956 progresses.

Best wishes for a merry Christmas and a wonderful New Year.

With kindest regards,

Sincerely yours,

It was a copy of one of his own paintings, and when he asked who had done it his gardener said he had. He added that he had done lots of others, too. Steichen studied them. When he concluded they were in a way better than his he took all the Steichens in the house and made a big pile, to which he applied a match. The bonfire—"my gardener and I danced around it like Comanche Indians"—was a blazing testimonial to photography, and Steichen hasn't picked up a brush since. He was past forty then.

He immediately settled down for a year's concentrated study of photography. He took more than 1,000 pictures of a cup and saucer and when he at last abandoned them he had achieved mastery of every detail of his compositions. He had junked photographic fuzziness for precise detail. "It was about then, too, that I began to feel that I wasn't close enough to life in the work—mostly painting—that I was doing," he said. "I wanted to belong, to get close to life. I realized that painting was growing further and further away from representation, and that that was being left to photography. Photography, I felt, was more closely related than painting to what I was looking for in life."

Back in this country he spent fifteen years, between 1923 and 1938, as chief photographer for Condé Nast's Vanity Fair and Vogue. He later signed a contract with the J. Walter Thompson advertising agency. He took photographs of famous people and products account executives were trying to make famous. Chaplin, Dunney, Mencken, and others paraded before his lens almost as frequently as bottles of Jergens Lotion. His portraits, either of people or products, were spectacularly striking and successful. Others he photographed at one time or another included J. P. Morgan, President Taft, Greta Garbo, Richard Strauss, Isadora Duncan, and World War II. He was a Captain in the Navy in charge of a special aviation photographic unit, and he was aboard the USS Lexington when it was torpedoed in the Pacific in 1943. Two years later he was awarded the Distinguished Service Medal, and two years after that he came to the Museum.

"The possibilities of the camera have not yet been exhausted," Steichen observed, after bringing matters up to June 195[illegible]. "And right now I want to get started on my reapprenticeship. My three apprenticeships—well, if you want to call the first 'freshman,' the second 'cup and saucer,' and the third 'sophomore,' go ahead. I know I'll never reach graduate student." —BERNARD KALB.

Thank you for your letter of April 27th.

Your idea for a radio program might perhaps have merit, but I am sorry to say that the pressure of my own present broadcasting schedule prevents me from taking an interest in any additional programs.

If you wish to pursue your idea further with the network, I suggest that you contact Mr. Sig Mickelson, Vice-President in Charge of News and Public Affairs for CBS.

Dear Mr. Murrow:

I think you may infer from the above letterhead that I am not an eccentric habitually given to whimsical intrusions upon the thought and time of public men as busy as you are; but, in any case, I apologize in advance if this letter turns out to seem to you merely an intrusion.

Its point is that I have been formulating in my mind for the last two years an idea for a national radio program not only mature and interesting, but also concretely responsive to what many intelligent Americans consider a continually increasing national need. And it has not arisen out of my somewhat remote and immured isolation in Academe, but rather out of fairly full contacts with the "real" world-- notably some considerable experience as a staff-writer and editorialist for a nationally known newspaper, and a tour I made last year of the Asian sub-continent, where I talked with all sorts and conditions of men, from Nehru, Mohammed Ali, and Sir John Kotelewala to the rootless refugees of Karachi and the pavement-dwellers of Madras. In my casting about to offer this idea, I could come upon no one more logical than you, especially in the light of your recent interviews with Robert Oppenheimer and Nehru, both of which approached, if yet distantly, my own idea for an integrated and sustained program.

I do not wish to offer the idea to you in its details if, of course, such outside suggestions are merely bothersome or otherwise unwelcome to you. I intend to offer the idea somewhere-- wherever, in fact, I can elicit the assurance that it will at least be considered by authoritative officials. Nor do I wish to be mysterious about the idea, but you will understand that I need to know your own and your company's policy in such matters before I further distract your thought and time, or my own. Moreover, you will also understand, I am sure, that if the idea is considered, and considered favorably, I should be able to expect-- given, among other issues, the notorious salaries of teachers-- an adequate financial compensation.

Finally, I do not mean to suggest that I am myself trying to break into national radio, although since my Asian tour I am admittedly restive in the abstract provinces of the classroom. I could myself do the program responsibly and well; and if it is rejected nationally, I may indeed attempt it for a local outlet. What is more important is that it be done, and by someone qualified to do it.

If you will let me know, when you can, whether you do, at least, consider such outside proposals, I shall send you details by return mail. If, meanwhile, you wish easily to check on my seriousness and reliability, you might give a telephone call to Joseph E. Evans, editorial editor of the Wall Street Journal, my sometime college roommate, who will certainly vouch for me.

Very truly yours,
Kenneth Scholes

Dear Mr. Murrow:

Having always enjoyed your television show, "PERSON TO PERSON", I take great pleasure in writing you concerning your program, "SEE IT NOW" of Tuesday evening, April 26th. Your presentation of the community relations between the people of England and the personnel of the Strategic Air Command has inspired much favorable reaction and deserving praise. Secretary Talbott, General Twining and General White were most enthusiastic in their comments on the program.

I am fully aware of the trouble you experienced regarding clearance of certain film sequences. In fact, we were informed late that afternoon that you had cancelled the show - and justifiably so. However, the show was so good that I say, "Thank the Lord" you reconsidered and presented it as planned.

I have just taken on the job of Director of Information Services, and I would like to say that we in the Public Information field are the most directly concerned and especially grateful for your interest in the Air Force. I will deem it a pleasure to be able to assist you at any time on matters concerning the Air Force. May I thank you again, as your program was a genuine contribution to our community relations effort.

Mr. Irving Gitlin,
Columbia Broadcasting System,
New York City

Dear Irving:

In rereading the outline of the program we will discuss on Friday, I found it stiff, stilted, and empty of all the things I truly wanted to say. Therefore I prefer writing you in this informal manner. The idea, briefly, is for an historical program treated from a "geographical" point of view, and with a concept I believe completely new to Television.

Perhaps you will agree that the richest experience any traveller can have is that of visiting an historical site in the company of someone in full possession of the details of its history. Under the spell of proper guidance, the relics, the stones— the very landscape— all come to life. The traveller finds himself projected into an evocation of history. Dry historical facts suddenly become a human experience. The inevitably logical relationships of historical cause and effect become apparent, and one feels exhilarated by the physical contact with the location of history, and ennobled by the realization that one's life too is part of that broad canvas upon which human records are painted.

Some years ago Bernard Berenson brought to life for me the whole of the Renaissance while we stood in the middle of the Cathedral Square in Florence and he pointed out to me the doors of the Baptistry and related the whole of XV Century life to the competition that had gone into their conception. Once I visited Appomatox with Douglas Southall Freeman, and even the trees seemed to speak, though only Freeman was talking, telling slowly and methodically the hour by hour play of the end of the Confederacy., I have been fortunate in visiting other places with other authorities, and I look back on every one of those moments as priceless.

Historical associations follow us implacably. We read of them in books. We hear them in conversation. But for the most part they are completely disembodied of any personal relation, and generally will be until such a time as we visit and personally see what we have heard so often mentioned. And even then what we bring back from such a visit will be in direct relation to the stature of our guide.

Yet we Americans persist in chasing history in its authentic setting. Last year 750,000 Americans travelled to Europe and spent more than $ 2,000,000,000,000. Another 2,500,000, from every State, called at those monuments and shrines associated with our national history. This leaves nearly 160,000,000 Americans, most of whom plan— or even dream— of a day when the availability of baby sitters and finances will permit them to do just what their luckier fellows have already done.

I propose to bring those historical sites to the home of every Television set owner. Furthermore those sites would be explained, described, and their historical significance brought alive by a dominant, authoritative, acceptable personality who would relate the significance of stone and relic to the individual lives of every viewer so that each could feel part of this human experience which was history at the moment of its making.

There will be no actors because the protagonists will be the true relics of the historic site themselves. The dramatic impact of the program will be carried by the recreation-- or is it evocation?-- of a period, a time, and personalities now past but who left these footprints, as it were, which are still visible to us all.

In brief that is the idea. It seems of potentially great dramatic impact. It would also seem commercial since, as you know, even in my own field of publishing history outsells fiction, approximately three to one. There are other derivatives of further commercial interest. But you and I will talk about these when we see each other on Friday.

My very best regards.

Cordially,

John H. Secondari

Dear Ed Murrow:

It appears, as if the American public is not fully aware of the far-reaching consequences of the basic changes, which are in the making in the foreign policy of Germany,though a few symptons have been reported.

I am sailing to Europe on June 24 and I shall have an unusual opportunity of studying these new developments at first hand on the spot in Germany. I am wondering, as to whether you might be interested in an exclusive research-report on these "New Ideas and Forces forming a New Foreign Policy of Germany".

Part of these developments appears to be a powerful movement for the re-unification of Germany. The impact of the new refugee forces, on which I reported to you previously, is just beginning to be felt.The significance for US foreign policy cannot be realised, unless the full implications of this historic turn of world events are understood.

Would you leave me a message with your secretary,if you are interested in having such a report of an independent observer? If you should wish to discuss the matter further, I could come over, as I live only two blocks from your office.

Hoping that I may have the pleasure of seeing you again for a few minutes, or have a note from you before my sailing

I CAN now tell you—and the B.B.C.—the name of the nude who appeared on TV last month and will do so again on Tuesday.

She is Miss Ivy Blunt, of Queen's Road, Wimbledon, a professional artists' model who is at present working at the Leicester College of art.

When I asked the B.B.C. about the unclothed model whose picture flashed into thousands of British homes, they weren't very helpful. "You were supposed to be looking at the easel, not the nude," they said. "We've no idea who she was. . . ."

Maybe they'll be interested to know.

Second Chance

MISS BLUNT has often been photographed in various poses but she had no idea that her picture was to appear on TV. She didn't see the programme herself but her back view was recognised by some of her friends.

Then she read my story, saw the picture of herself—reproduced here again, this time with her portrait—and wrote to tell me about herself.

Now the film — "Walter Sickert"—is to be shown again on TV at 10.10 p.m. on Tuesday and, say the B.B.C., it will NOT be cut. So, there's your chance to see Miss Blunt's back view again.

Dear Ed:

The year 1955 is drawing to a close, and it seems to be an appropriate time to wish one's friends all the best for the coming year. It is with this thought in mind that I'm sending you a very special Dutch treat -- it is called the "Duivekater".

According to reliable sources, the "Duivekater" dates from ancient times when a sacrificial loaf was substituted for the traditional offerings of animals or meat. Evidently the heathen Teutonic tribes were always out for personal gain. The shape of the "Duivekater" bears a strong resemblance to that of a leg of meat. In later years the "Duivekater" became very popular in Holland. Poetry of the middle ages contains numerous references to the "Duivekater". Jan Steen, the celebrated 17th Century Dutch artist immortalized it in two of his paintings, "Saint Nicholas Eve" and in "Oostwaard the Baker".

Baker Kroes, in the Nieuwendam quarter of Amsterdam, still bakes the "Duivekater". Although it was originally made only from the Eve of St. Nicholas Day, which is December 5th until the twelfth night (January 6th) the "Duivekater" is baked for other festive occasions also, to satisfy the cravings of those who cannot bear to wait a whole year for this exceptional delicacy. There is no denying that the modern "Duivekater" is even more toothsome than formerly, when the choice ingredients used nowadays were still scarce or completely unknown. This festal loaf has a very unusual taste -- quite different from bread or cake.

Here is how you eat it: Cut "Duivekater" into thin slices. Spread with butter. (This brings out the full flavor).

The loaf does not deteriorate with keeping. In fact, most people prefer to let it stand about a week before eating. Now, taste and enjoy the "Duivekater" with a cup of tea or coffee.

A Happy New Year to you and yours.

Sincerely,

Arthur Settel

My dear Ed.,

It was awfully pleasant meeting you for a short while so unexpectedly at the Century Club.

While regretting that I am not the sort of chap who does well in a Confucian Monastery, I do look forward to the pleasure of a few days fishing with you after the convention in August. Please don't forget the date because I am genuinely looking forward not only to the fishing but to your company.

I think you said that you might be good enough to let me have a few letters of introduction to people at the Coast, in San Francisco or Los Angeles, or in the general area. I would be particularly delighted with any introductions you could give me to such golf playing characters as Bing Crosby, Bob Hope, etc., who will not be hard up (like you) for the buck I shall extract from them by dint of my demon putting and raking drives from the tee.

I do hope I shall have the pleasure of seeing you before I depart, and if that shooting contest comes off early in December, I shall much look forward to bagging my bird.

Dear Ed,

When I heard about the likelihood of a May 26 election in Britain, I wrote Howard asking whether he could use me as extra help in the campaign, or, if he brings in staff men from the continent, whether I could substitute for one of them. I intend to be off to Europe about May 1 by way of killing time before the publication date of my book (end of July) and I can think of no happier way of occupying myself than as a CBS man.

I write to you in the hope that you might second the notion with the powers at the other end of the 17th floor, or that your own organization might be able to use me overseas during the campaign period. I guess I'm a stranger to the news hierarchy on the 17th floor, parvenus that they are to us veterans.

Have you had time to read the novel? It seems to have created a stir in the trade. My publisher has turned down the Literary Guild on the expectation that we'll make Book of the Month. Keep your fingers crossed. I really can't write this well; it's merely that London '42-'44 made so singular an impression on me. In other words, the work is a triumph of trauma over talent.

All the best,

I notice that you have a big report on Africa scheduled for your "See It Now" series this Fall. By coincidence - and this is confidential - LOOK is scheduling an all-Africa issue to hit newsstands for the two-week period starting November 1st which will be loaded with pieces by Stevenson, Hemingway, and many other world figures.

I think that we can come up with a major tie-up between your Africa show and our Africa issue, provided your show were scheduled somewhere between the three week period beginning October 25th, wherein you might use material from the LOOK issue on your show, crediting LOOK, of course, and we, in turn, would run a tune-in ad for "See It Now" in LOOK, adjacent to some of the Africa material.

If this suggestion seems attractive to you, Ralph Ginzburg and I would be delighted to sidle over your way any time you say, and the sooner the better for all of us.

Warmest regards.

Dear Ed,

There is or was a boy working for you in the mail department called John Kuntz. His mother, Adelaide, is an old friend of mine and a very nice woman. The boy is, I gather, a shy athlete(or so she says) with radio ambitions, but afraid to speak to you although he sees you often. He is disgusted by the sycophancy of those who are continually making up to executives, Adelaide says, and this adds to his shyness.

Anyhow he is going to the University of Georgia and wants to work at the CBS Atlanta station in some capacity while he is in college. He sounds like a good kid; I haven't seen him since he was very small, but since then he has been in the Marines and all. His mother wrote to me on August 10 and I have only now dug up her letter--it was lost in a mess of letters. Perhaps it is too late; perhaps he has already gone to Georgia. But at any rate she asked me to write to you and I have now done so.

How is Casey?

Dear Mr. Murrow:

We have heard with great interest from Kenneth Baker, Manager of The Sheraton-Carlton Hotel in Washington, that you have an interest in early American furniture. As you will see from the enclosed page taken from Life Magazine of a few weeks ago, Life has incorrectly come to the conclusion that the writer knew something about this subject. Although we cannot pass as an expert, we too are intensely interested in 18th Century American furniture. Needless to say, we are considerably "biased" in favor of Sheraton design.

Mr. Baker mentioned that you are interested in the Sheraton mahogany clock in the early American suite at the Carlton. This clock was built by Tayber of Roxbury, Massachusetts shortly after 1800. It was purchased for $500, although clocks of this type frequently bring up to $1,000.

We have another very similar clock made by Matthew Edgerton of New Brunswick, N.J. This clock is slightly earlier than the Sheraton clock which you saw. It has the name of Wm. P. Dawes inscribed in it. It is 8 ft. 21 1/2 inches tall and is, in the opinion of Willis B. Clough (the head of our antique furniture purchasing office at this address), even finer than the one you saw. It is a Hepplewhite design and has an inlay mahogany case. It appears to be in excellent condition and is now running. However, on account of its age, we would not wish to be responsible for how long it would run. If you are interested in this clock, we would be glad to send it to New York or Washington with the understanding that you could return it to us in the event that you did not wish to retain it.

We have quite a large floor in this building (the 7th floor at 470 Atlantic Avenue) where Mr. Clough has quite a large number of pieces of early American furniture, including mirrors, desks, tables, highboys, etc. If you should be in Boston at any time, I am sure Mr. Clough would be delighted to show these items to you, and since they have been purchased advantageously, he should be able to quote you a price as much as 40% below what dealers would ordinarily charge for such items.

Should you ever come to Boston, Mrs. Henderson would be very pleased indeed to show you our home at #8 Louisburg Square where we have quite a few 18th Century furniture pieces which she would take great pleasure in showing to you.

Best regards from one who particularly enjoys Radio Station WEEI at 7:45 P.M.

'MR. SHERATON' SEARCHES FOR SOME ANTIQUES . . .

CHEST ON CHEST, in the Chippendale style and about 175 years old, cost Henderson $2,300. Here he discusses refinishing it with a cabinetmaker.

CHIPPENDALE SECRETARY (above) did not interest Henderson enough to buy it. But the hotelman paid $375 for Chippendale mirror shown below.

IN PALACE HOTEL'S GARDEN COURT ERNEST HENDERSON STANDS BENEATH ITS CLASSIC CHANDELIERS

AND BUYS A FINE OLD HOTEL

Ernest Henderson, who is head of the $160 million Sheraton Hotel Corporation of America and is sometimes called "Mr. Sheraton," recently acquired Manhattan's 700-room Hotel Astor, boosting his chain's total to 30 hotels. One of his first acts as new host was to inspect the Astor's presidential suite where President Eisenhower was to stay during a New York visit last week. He was not pleased with what he found—French Renaissance decor all through the suite's five rooms. An antique connoisseur, he decided to give the suite his personal attention. Making the rounds of the East Side's best shops, he picked up Sheraton sofas, some Chippendale and even a chair once owned by George Washington. Having spent $20,000 and seen the last antique placed properly in the rooms, "Mr. Sheraton" went on to buy the biggest antique of them all: San Francisco's grandiose, tradition-soaked $6 million hotel, The Palace.

Mr. Henderson, with the decorators for Sheraton have been attending sales and locating otherwise, individual antique pieces for the Sheraton Hotels. Mr. Henderson expressed willingness to be of assistance in securing pieces in which you have interest. You expressed a special interest in the Taber clock in the hallway of the suite.

Mr. Henderson advised that either he could write to you or you write to him your interests, and perhaps if you are in Boston sometime you and Mr. Henderson could get together and he could show you and discuss the antique pieces.

Dear Mr. Murrow:

I thought you might be interested in seeing the editorial reference I have marked in the current issue of The Churchman. Also, the booklet we have just printed composed of reprints of some of the quotations we have used on the cover of the paper, which seems to have had an enthusiastic reception.

More particularly, I wanted you to see the copy of The Geneva Gazette. As perhaps you know, William Smith is the women's college coordinated with Hobart, which is my college. Hobart men have always taken much pride in the fact that it graduated Elizabeth Blackwell, the first woman in the world who succeeded in entering and graduating from a medical school.

The Gazette, the first and only issue of this journal, was thought up by some of the alumnae as a gadget to help increase their alumnae fund this year. It struck me as a clever stunt.

The Elizabeth Blackwell story is so interesting that I have wondered whether it wouldn't make a good program sometime for TV. She had a distinguished career. One of the stories is that after she had been turned down by all the medical schools of the country, she applied to Hobart--then Geneva College--and the medical faculty put it up to the student body for decision, apparently thinking they would turn thumbs down. Whether as a joke or not, and to the discomfort of the faculty, the students voted okay.

Please tell your wife that I see her former roommate, Lee, often, since we live in the same town. I still remember the pleasant evening I spent with you both in London in '43--and your salted nuts!

My gratitude for the fine job you are doing.

A Lying Informer

MORE THAN FIVE MONTHS AGO, we printed an expose of the self-confessed lying informer, Harvey M. Matusow. In the past few weeks the daily press has been forced to get around to carrying stories on the extent to which Matusow has lied before congressional investigating committees. For months we have been pointing out the damage which has been done to the reputations of honest and loyal American citizens, including Protestant clergymen, by professional liars paid by the United States government out of tax-payers' money. Among other such crooked informers is Manning Johnson, who testified against the Rev. Jack McMichael. He admitted under oath in a Pittsburgh case that he had not only lied many times before investigating committees but said he would do so "a thousand times" for the F.B.I.

It was in our September issue of last year that we printed the original expose of Matusow under the caption "An Informer Apologizes." This was a memorandum written by Bishop G. Bromley Oxnam following a conversation Matusow had sought with him at the Waldorf Astoria, New York, on April 27, 1954. The bishop sent us also another memorandum on a subsequent conversation he had with Matusow, but which Dr. Oxnam said at that time was not for publication.

In the memorandum we published Bishop Oxnam wrote: "I said [to Matusow] 'And why do you want to see me?' He replied that he had had a religious experience of considerable significance and was a completely changed man. He said, 'I have lied again and again in my statements to these committees and in my reports, and I want to go to each individual about whom I have falsified to ask his forgiveness.' . . . I did not ask him about the religious experience so far as a church is concerned, because I thought he might have been one of those who had given up complete control of the mind such as exists in Community Party membership for another control of the mind in which some have found satisfaction; namely, in the Roman Catholic Church." [Italics ours.]

In the recent hearings Matusow said that he had helped the Lennen & Newell advertising agency make up a blacklist, at the time he was doing the same kind of work for "Counterattack," a besmirching news letter fostered by Roman Catholics, which has many times attacked THE CHURCHMAN. It was this organization which published "Red Channels", a blacklist of 150 motion picture and other actors, most of whom thereafter found it impossible to secure work after being discharged by timid sponsors.

It was this same organization which sent a representative to see Bishop Oxnam, attempting to get the bishop to refuse to accept the Churchman Award, which he had been voted, in 1949.

Matusow also testified that he worked with Jack Wren, in charge of security for Batten, Barton, Durstine & Osborn, another advertising agency, in making up a blacklist. He said that, as in other cases, he had wrongly accused persons named on this list. Day after day at the hearings he has made many other similar confessions.

It is this kind of government paid witnesses whose testimony against loyal and distinguished Americans has been exploited by the daily press and other journals, and swallowed by millions of citizens of our country, including endless numbers of church people.

We have no judgment on the sincerity of Harvey Matusow in his alleged repentence for bearing false witness, but we think it far past high time for churchman who have believed this kind of falsehood to indulge in some meditation on the commandment, "Thou shall not bear false witness against thy neighbor," and then do a little repenting themselves. Their repentance might include the asking forgiveness for their fear of "associating" with those who have been smeared by such lying informers as Matusow.

Nehru Speaks For Goodwill

WE HAVE LONG BELIEVED that American churchmen who too frequently overlook the basic principles of their own religion could learn much from Nehru. In Edward R. Murrow's talk with him on the program "See It Now," the Indian Prime Minister said, in reference to our Formosa problem and other world relationships, that we needed "patience, understanding, charity and compassion,"—words which should hardly be unfamiliar to Christians, but which too often are not put into practice. Mr. Nehru used them in connection with his correct assertion, in reference to our international relations, that there has been "far too much shouting at each other," and too much "running down" of the other party. These are words which will do no harm to any American willing to listen! He said, also, that military power alone was not sufficient in dealing with the great masses of Asia and that their problems can be solved only by understanding "in their new revolutionary context" and by "full cooperation." We share his conviction that we face a "psychological problem—the problem of friendly understanding and not merely showing that if they don't behave they will not get some benefit or they might get injured." One must win the minds not by threats "but by good works." All of which sounds as though it might have come out of the New Testament.

Nixon, Rome and Communism

WHEN VICE PRESIDENT NIXON made his statement about the Roman church during his visit to Guatemala, he didn't reckon with Dr. John A. Mackay, president of Princeton Theological Seminary. Mr. Nixon said that the Roman church was "one of the major bulwarks against communism and totalitarian ideas." "I am compelled sorrowfully to say that the exact opposite

Dear Ed:

Originally I had wanted to wire you, but then I felt that the traditional years of singing birthday telegrams would dull what I had to say.

Tuesday night's program with Oppenheimer was just tremendous. I can only voice a respectful congratulations to you, and say that this is still another reason why we are delighted you are coming to Louisville later this month, and why we will both televise and broadcast your address.

As you probably know, the Louisville library system is much more than a mausoleum for books. It is an aggressive member of the community with many services including facilities to show motion pictures. If it would be possible to get a TVR of Tuesday night's program, we would like to present it to the Louisville Public Library for showing in its various branches on a non-commercial basis. Since Alcoa is a small family type corporation, we would be willing to pay for the cost of the print.

Although I know several people, including the vice squad, are extending invitations of hospitality to you while you are in Louisville, if there is anything we can do during your trip, just whistle.

Dear Ed:

I have got back from the most interesting journey I have ever made. As you know, I did not follow the beaten path to Geneva this time, but went from London to Paris, Strasbourg, Luxembourg, Brussels and Bonn, and back to London again, talking all the time with Government officials, including Schuman, Spaak, Bech, Mayer and others. I enclose a short statement of my conclusions. It is an inadequate statement and does not cover all of them by any means. I ought to play up the personalities!

I want very much to chat with you, but don't see how it can be done at the moment. I am leaving fpr Woodstock this afternoon and will only be in my office on Wednesday, the 7th, before leaving for a conference at Montebello, Quebec, with the Council on Foreign Relations and their Canadian and British counterparts I get back here on Sunday the 11th for a meeting of the Commission to Study the Organization of Peace. If there were a chance of seeing you on the 12th, I would stay over for it, but otherwise I would go back to Woodstock on the 11th, for I have not had any rest all summer. I made a confidential diary which you will seewhen it is mimeographed. It's quite a story .

HOW REAL IS THE WESTERN UNION UNION?

While at Geneva this summer two new chapters in world history were begun on disarmament and atomic energy, another chapter, less dramatic but equally important, were being written in the planning and upbuilding of the union of the free nations of Western Europe. For a number of reasons, this third chapter of international history has not received the attention it deserves First of all, it offered no such breath-taking excitement as the Eisenhower offer to extend inspection to detect plans for aggression nor the unveiling of atomic secrets to scientists the world over. The European problems had lost the glamor whihh Churchill had once cast over them by the magic of imagination, or with which Jean Monnet had invested them by the incredible creation of the Coal and Steel Community. They had become problems for technicians and so were treated more and more technically, with the result that various bodies overlapped and the whole scene became confused. Under these circumstances,a mood of doubt clouded all international thinking in Europe especially after the French Parliament in 1953 killed the proposal for an international army, the ill-fated European Defense Community, which was to match in the field of security the Coal and Steel Community in the field of economics. Moreover, the political framework for unity was inadequate. The one body that was composed of members of parliament from all Western European countries, the Council of Europe at Strasbourg, was losing out in public opinion because it could only pass resolutions, having no authority to see that they were enforced.

All in all, the omens were not favorable for the movement for European unity in 1955. Yet, by the end of the summer, it was stronger than ever The mood of discouragement is still cherished by conservatives and reactionaries; but, Paul Henri Spaak, the outstanding leader in the creation of a new Europe, has said that at present there is no first class mind in any Western European country who is not an "European." The nationalists have many followers, but the trend in intelligent circles is away from them.

The outstanding fact to begin with is the amazing prosperity of the countries of Western and Northern Europe. After the devastation of World War II, a greater devastation than in World War I, they are better off than on the eve of the war in 1938. There is no doubt in anyone's mind that this is due primarily to the Marshall Plan, not only for the billions of American dollars for recovery and rehabilitation, but also because of the provision insisted upon by the United States, that it would deal only with the recipient countries as a whole and not with nations pulling apart or seeking special favors at the expense of their neighbors, or needlessly duplicating plants and rural economies. The creation of the Organization of European Economic Cooperation (O.E.E.C.) to meet the conditions set forth by Washington has turned out to be as important, in the long run, as the Marshall Plan subsidies themselves in the immediate, post-war emergency. O.E.E.C. is the one great success in international economic planning. The two volumes of the Sixth Annual Report of O. E. E. C., published last March, tell an incredible story of steadily increasing prosperity, until the more cautious and conservative economists are worried that it may be going too far. The Payments Union, which is a part of its system, has worked so well in the monetary field that the Benelux countries (Belgium, the Netherlands and Luxembourg), and the Federal Republic of Germany already advocate the convertibility of currencies, a step which Great Britain and France, for different reasons, are reluctant as yet to take.

Even more incredible than the success of the Marshall Plan is that of the one supra-national institution in control of a great international business enterprise, the Coal and Steel Community, which handles fifty per cent of the freight of its six member countries. The creative genius of this organization and its former President, Jean Monnet, proposed some months ago that the Community embrace as well as' coal and steel, transportation of all kinds by rail, water, roads and air, and power including atomic energy, while securing a lessening on political barriers to trade. In Monnet's words, the Coal and Steel Community should be the beginning of a United States of Europe. Opposition from the French Government of Mendes-France led him to resign, with the result that the six Foreign Ministers of the German Federal Republic, the Netherlands, Belgium, Luxembourg, France and Italy, met at Messina last May, and, appointing a new President, M. René Mayer, outlined a program to study to deal with the Monnet proposals. The head of the committee in charge of this work, which is to be completed by the first of October, M. Paul-Henri Spaak, is the one man best qualified of all European statesman today to draft the blue prints of a new Europe, for that is what it amounts to. The supra-national plan gives way to a more realistic international scheme; but in the opinion of President Mayer, there need be no difficulty in fitting these new activities into the working structure of the supra-national Coal and Steel Community. In short, the revolution begun by Mr. Monnet in the economic life of Europe is likely to go on, if at a slower and less daring pace.

Parallel with this salvaging of the plans for Europeanizing economics are those in the field of security. The European Defence Community had been planned along the same lines as the Coal and Steel Community as a supra-national army. There was bitter disappointment among its advocates in Washington, s well as in Paris, when the French Parliament rejected it. Fears were expressed that German militarism might again threaten the peace, if it were not held in check by a supra-national control. There had always been a doubt in certain quarters that it would not work in any case; but, however that might be, the defeat of E.D.C. was turned to advantage by the statesmanship of Eden and Adenauer. The Brussels Pact of 1948, negotiated by Foreign Minister Bevin as a guarantee against either Soviet or German aggression, was transformed by Eden in a conference in Paris in 1954 to include Germany in a West European Union. The land and air forces of the seven nations were placed under the Supreme Allied Command of Europe, thus linking defense with SHAPE and NATO. Not the least important item in the treaty was the commitmet of Great Britain to maintain a force of four divisions and a Tactical Air Force on the Continent. Little was heard about the West European Union as such, - although it had been blueprinted in both the Brussels and the Paris Pacts, - until the meeting of the Council of Europe in July, when that body adjourned for a day to allow W.E.U., as it was called, to form an Assembly in addition to its already existing council of ministers. Then, to this newly organized Union, two major tasks were assigned: the problem of the Saar, on which the Council of Europe had done excellent work; and that of the standardization of armaments in connection with SHAPE. Headquarters of the Union were hastily improvised in London, although the officers are from the continental countries.

Such is the outline of the functional bodies which carry on the all-important task of practical unification in Western Europe. But the political organ, the Council of Europe at Strasbourg, is also showing signs of new life. This body had an entirely different origin from those noted above. It grew out of a mobilization of public opinion to create a United States of Europe, such as Briand had advocated in 1924, and Count Coudenhove-Kalergi had outlined in his plan for an European Union for the Continent. In 1948, at an unofficial "Congress of Europe" held at the Hague, an European Movement was inaugurated which later held a conference in Brussels under the chairmanship of Winston Churchill and Paul-Henri Spaak. In the following months, parallel with the Brussels Treaty Organization, a Statute of Europe was drawn up, establishing the Council of Europe, composed of a Consultative Assembly and a Committee of Ministers. Ten governments signed this treaty and the "Parliament of Europe," as it was proudly termed, came into existence.

But the Assembly, although composed of members of parliaments in the various countries, is only "Consultative." It is a debating forum with no legislative power and the Council of Ministers has not acted as an European cabinet. The result has been a growing sense of unreality, as the debates tended to keep repeating generalities rather than dealing with practical political issues. This year, however, all that was changed. The only Foreign Minister who addressed the Assembly in vague terms of aspirations and aims was Mr. MacMillan, the British Foreign Minister. The others got down to business, reporting what they had been planning to do to make the program of the Messina Conference real. It was especially heartening to have the assurance of the French Government, composed as it is, partly of De Gaulists, that the Europeanizing of posts and telegraphs as well as transportation was already in hand. There were some fifteen Cabinet Ministers present to participate in the debates, in addition to the members of parliament who constitute the Assembly.

What is the impact of this semi-official parliament on the policies of Europe? There is no way to measure this influence. But it has been pointed out that over one hundred and twenty-five members of the British House of Commons have been members of the Strasbourg Assembly in the last five years, and that when Sir Anthony Eden pronounced that the Pact of Paris called for a permanent British armed force on the Continent there was no protest from the "backbenchers." The inference is at least challenging. It may be that Strasbourg is by way of becoming more of a capital of Europe than the skeptics are willing to admit

There are two kinds of political union: federal union, like that of the United States, in which the functions of government are defined in a single, closely knit system; and the commonwealth type of union which leaves its members varying degrees of sovereignty. The British system allows its self-governing units not only home rule but a large measure of independence in dealing with other nations They are treated like the nations they feel themselves to be. Canada, for example, has not only its own foreign service but, like its sister members of the Commonwealth, the right to decide on war and peace Yet the unity of this British system is one of the most solid facts of history. Undoubtedly the plans for West European Union will have more of the British method of practical politics than the more symmetrical American legal structure Such functional unity as is being worked out under the Organization for European Economic Cooperation could conceivably produce the most important of all symbols of sovereignty if the movement for convertibility should culminate in an European currency The way to this goal is difficult but not impossible. Indeed, the word "impossible" is as out of place in European political economy as it is put of place in the world of nuclear energy. It must be admitted, however, that the breaking down of age-old habits of thought is often more difficult than the breaking of the atom.

Dear Ed: next week

Friday, 6 August, is Dr. Shotwell's eightieth birthday.

Some of us have been considering plans for a suitable celebration of this occasion. It became clear that nothing elaborate could be done on the day itself because it comes in the middle of the vacation period, and furthermore Dr. Shotwell is now at his summer place at Woodstock, New York. We are accordingly mulling over plans for an appropriate event to take place sometime in the fall.

As for the day itself, I and two or three other people representing key interests in Dr. Shotwell's life plan to visit him in Woodstock.

I thought you might like to send him some message of greeting. If so, Woodstock, New York, is a sufficient address, or you can alternatively send it to me here at the Endowment, and I shall take it up with me.

With best regards,

Sincerely yours,

My dear Mr. Murrow:

Confirming the telephone conversation today between Mr. Daniel Schorr of the Columbia Broadcasting System in Washington and Mr. Horn of the Embassy, it is most unfortunate that, according to information received from Finland this morning, Jean Sibelius feels that he is not in a position to appear in the television interview which you have so very kindly requested.

Professor Sibelius has asked the Embassy to convey to you, Mr. Murrow, his sincerest expressions of regret as well as the assurances that he is highly honored by your invitation.

Knowing that in his advancing years Professor Sibelius has found it necessary to maintain a general policy of not granting interviews, his declination is on the part of the Embassy understandable. Deeply appreciating your interest to have Sibelius as a guest on your program, the Embassy regrets profoundly that the arrangements could not be made.

Sincerely yours,

Dear Mr. Murrow:

You may be interested in knowing that in a recent communication from Dr. Henry Sigerest's secretary, I was informed that he is making a slow but effective recovery. He is able to walk about and soon I hope will be fully recovered.

If I hear any further news, I shall transmit it to you.

Dear Ed:

What follows might possibly belong in the Ed Murrow-he-needs-it-like-a-hole-in-the-head-department:

At any rate, enclosed is a letter which has just come in from the Manager of the General Publishing Department of Odhams Press, Ltd., Harold Shelton. As you will see, Shelton would like to publish a British edition of a book by you on the story of Anglo-American relations as derived from your personal experiences. If you should do such a book, S&S would, of course, be delighted with the opportunity of doing the American edition. Meantime, enclosed also is a letter which Shelton has asked me to forward to you.

I was fascinated by last Friday's PERSON-to-PERSON broadcast. What a contrast between Marilyn and Sir Thomas!

Always yours,

Dick

P.S. Along with this letter, I am asking the messenger to carry with him a copy of DESIGNING FOR PEOPLE by Henry Dreyfuss. The thought occurred to me, a few months back, that Henry Dreyfuss might be an interesting person for you and your staff to visit. This is not only because of his own interesting and charming personality, but because of the set-up he has whereby his home is semi-attached to his office. At any rate, here is the finished book and you can figure out, much better now than you could before, what sort of subject he would make for Person-to-Person. As you will gather when looking over the book, I think very highly of Dreyfuss. In addition to editing his book, I took special pleasure in writing the foreword and making the photograph which appears on the back of the jacket.

Dear Mr. Simon,

I very much enjoyed our meeting in Long Acre and was only sorry that circumstances (quite literally) over which I had no control prevented us meeting again before you left for the States. However, I hope that is a pleasure only deferred until your next visit to this country.

Mr. Shard mentioned among the points which cropped up during your talk with him the possibility of Mr. Murrow writing a book for our imprint on the story of Anglo-American relations as derived from his personal experience. I understand that you would be interested in doing an American edition of this book but that you thought the approach would come more appropriately from ourselves.

I have therefore written Mr. Murrow and am enclosing my letter, as I cannot trace his address. I wonder if you would be kind enough to forward it.

Yours sincerely,

Ed. Murrow Esq.

Dear Mr. Murrow,

Your name crops up so often in the news of Anglo-American relations over here that I am sure the British public would be keenly interested to read your memoirs insofar as they relate to Anglo-American relations and particularly, of course, with reference to the tremendous influence which you have yourself had in bettering them.

I wonder if the idea strikes you as a feasible one. It seems useless for me to go into any further detail until I have your reaction to the general idea but I should just like to say this - that if you decided on writing such a book with a special eye to British people we should be very happy indeed to publish it, and I am quite sure it would have some material influence by informing people over here of the attitude and aspirations of a distinguished American.

Such a book might well, in my view, contribute something quite important to the mutual understanding of the people of Britain and the United States.

With compliments,
Yours faithfully,

Your comments about the Russian heavy arms and industries build up on Thursday night prompts me to send this article in case you care to read it. Need not return it. I think it is interesting, and I suspect I hope it's true. If I had a radio program, I'd never go on the air without some reference to the necessity for the communists to become human if they want to have a place in the world of humans - that until then they must swim in their own atrocities.

I enjoyed a chance meeting with Janet early this week. Looked very pretty.

Marx Was a City Boy or, Why Communism May Fail

W. W. Rostow

The men in the Kremlin have never liked—or understood—the farmer. A distinguished student of the Soviets explains why the resulting blunders, by Russia and her satellites, might prove fatal to their power.

I AM by profession an economist and economic historian. The bulk of my academic life has been taken up with studying the world's economic development during the nineteenth century. I have just ended three years' work on the Soviet Union and Communist China. The task there was not to study Communist economies but to discern, if possible, the shape and prospects for change in the whole societies now dominated from Moscow and Peking: their politics, social life, foreign policy, and their economies.

The title of this article reflects perhaps the most important single idea about Communism which I have acquired during these three years of study.

I believe that Marx failed to understand the farmer. From that misunderstanding has flowed a century of Communist theory and practice. And, more important, from Communist theory and practice has arisen a set of problems whose solution or failure of solution may well wreck the international Communist movement—or force profound and wholesome change upon it.

Perhaps the most dangerous enemy of Communism is the stoic, passive peasant in Eastern Germany, Poland, the Soviet Union itself, China, and Northern Vietnam. He will certainly not revolt on his own under present circumstances; but even a police state cannot make him increase his output on the scale Communist plans require.

The passive figure of the peasant, trapped in totalitarianism, is joined as a potentially mortal enemy of Communism by the farmer in the Free World—notably in the underdeveloped areas and perhaps most notably, at the moment, by the awakening Indian peasant.

This, in any case, is my theme. I should like to develop it by tracing out how Communism has come to tangle at cross purposes with the peasant; the consequences of this generally quiet struggle; the problems which it creates for the Communist leadership; and the opportunities it opens to the Free World.

The story begins with Marx himself. There is an excellent book by David Mitrany called Marx Against the Peasant. Mr. Mitrany's book examines the trouble Communism had from the beginning with agriculture and the farmer. Marx's theory of history—though couched in the heavy and pretentious style of Germanic scholarship—is essentially a simple one. He believed that by an inevitable series of class struggles, bourgeois capitalism had conquered feudalism; and that the urban working class, created by industrial capitalism, would inevitably inherit power and authority when capitalism had dug its grave.

This theory represented Marx's reading of British history as he looked backward and forward from the middle of the nineteenth century. As he wrote he could see in England a decline of the political power of agriculture and an increasing dependence of Britain on imported rather than home-produced food. This—plus the fact that he was a bookish city fellow—led him to dispose of the farmer, in his theory and his prescriptions for the future, in a highly casual way. For example, the Communist Manifesto of 1848, in making its recommendations for the future, simply had this to say about agriculture:

> The establishment of industrial armies, especially for agriculture. Combination of agriculture with manufacturing industries; gradual abolition of distinction between town and country, by a more equable distribution of the population over the country.

In short, Marx's notion was that history would make of the farmer simply an industrial worker of one sort or another; and he could embrace the farmer ultimately in the same formula he mechanically applied to the industrial working class. The farmer, with his passionate desire to own his own piece of land and to till it in his own interest, annoyed Marx. As a theorist of history, Marx found the farmer out of place; and there is a note of human irritation and annoyance in Marx's treatment of him. Marx allowed no special place for him and for agriculture in his major writing.

One can dispose of such matters with ease —in theory. But the practical politics of Marxism, from the very beginning, ran into trouble with the peasant of Central and Eastern Europe. Before the revolutions in Russia of 1917, Marxist politicians had the greatest difficulty in gaining any significant base of support among the peasants. The real discontents of European peasants, focussed on land reform and redistribution, were expressed through peasant parties which grew up in the fifty years or so before the first world war. These parties were generally non-Marxist and, often, anti-Marxist. Except for a brief flirtation with the notion that the Russian village organization—the mir—could be built into a Socialist state, Marxist ideas did not harmonize naturally with the impulses of the European peasant. Brushing the peasant aside as a kind of miscast rural industrial worker, Marxism abandoned him to other leaders.

Two Practical Politicians

Now comes a monumental irony of modern history. Without the peasant's unsatisfied desire to own his land, there would not have been a Russian revolution in 1917 and, almost certainly, the Bolsheviks would not have triumphed in the Communist phase of that revolution in November 1917. Not Marxism or Socialism or Communism, but the peasant's great longing for land was the most powerful single engine of the Russian upheaval of 1917.

In 1917 Lenin perceived this fact. He was thoroughly prepared to junk or alter Marxist theory in the interests of the immediate struggle for power. As a practical politician, he managed to harness a good deal of the discontent which had infected the peasant-born Russian armies; and he used this non-Marxist —almost anti-Marxist—motive to seize power.

Lenin's 1917 slogans were: Land, Bread, and Peace. Despite seventy years of Marxism, in the showdown Lenin rated the peasant's desire for land the most effective political force to which he could appeal.

In China the peasant was even more important to Communist victory than he was in Russia. At first, the Chinese Communists sought to achieve power by mobilizing strength in the cities. They organized the industrial workers and infiltrated union organizations in the approved manner. It took a whole series of defeats, starting in 1927, to disabuse them of this strategy.

The emergence of Mao-tse Tung between 1927 and 1935 developed directly from his two perceptions: (1) that the desire of the poor peasant for a bit of land which he could call his own was a powerful political force; and (2) that if he associated the Communist movement with that force, he had a chance to build an effective military establishment in the countryside, with which he might ultimately seize power. This strategy was regarded for some time in Moscow as unorthodox.

From a Western point of view, however, there is nothing inconsistent with Communism about it. Lenin in his own way was equally flexible in his Marxism. The underlying truth is, of course, that long before 1917 and long before 1949, when Communism was victorious in China, Communism had ceased to be a philosophy of history and an ideological movement in the Western sense. It had become primarily a tactical conspiracy, by a self-appointed elite, for the pursuit and maintenance of power. As such, it was prepared to make its slogans fit its power requirements. Lenin, Stalin, and Mao all did this when occasion demanded.

We are confronted, then, with a first-class irony of modern history. Marxist theory had —and has—no sympathy or interest in the desires of the farmer. Nevertheless, Communist tacticians in both Russia and China achieved power in large part by harnessing to their purposes the peasant's aspiration for his own land.

WHAT happened to the peasant once the Communists took over? In Russia, Lenin found himself by 1921 in a position of crisis. The cities were not receiving their normal supply of food from the peasants, and famine stalked the land. Under the impact of wartime Communism, industry had fallen to about 20 per cent of prewar output. Perhaps most important, Lenin faced serious opposition within the ranks of his party. There were many in the Communist rank and file who had helped make the revolution of November 1917 but were angry and distressed in 1920 and 1921 to see emerge a bureaucratic dictatorship rather than the humanistic regime for which they had fought. In this period of crisis, Lenin ruthlessly crushed his political opponents, but appeased the peasants—for the moment. He launched a New Economic Policy one of whose aims was to induce the peasant to produce again for the urban market.

Between 1921 and 1929 the Russian peasant was basically free. He operated the land he had gained in the revolutionary year of 1917 for his own benefit and that of his family. He sold his grain on an open market, paying a fixed tax in grain which he generally judged to be fair. The more able and vigorous peasants acquired land and grew relatively well-to-do; and Russian agriculture, sustained by individual incentive, revived.

Miracle by Brute Force

WITH the launching of the First Five Year Plan in 1929 all this changed. Stalin had triumphed as the sole successor to Lenin after four years of bitter infighting within the Communist party. With his personal authority assured he turned to the problem of building a heavy industry in Russia and fastening an effective political control over the country. Whatever Stalin's economic reasons for the collectivization of agriculture may have been, there is no doubt that one of its primary purposes was to guarantee political and social control of the Russian peasantry. From a Communist perspective the Russian peasantry enjoyed an unnatural and dangerous freedom in the 1920s.

The result was, of course, the brutal rapid collectivization during which, on Stalin's testimony to Churchill, ten million Russians died. More than that, there was a 20 per cent fall in agricultural output. And as Khrushchev revealed in September 1953 Soviet farm production has never really recovered from the blow of collectivization.

How could Russia achieve its extraordinary industrial and military growth since 1929 with stagnant or even declining agricultural production? It could do so because Stalin launched industrialization at a peculiar moment in Russian history. The Russia which the Communists inherited was normally a grain-exporting nation. Before the first world war Russian grain exports were as high as 10,000,000 tons, and even in the midst of the First Five Year Plan Stalin could wring 5,000,000 tons of grain exports a year from the Russian soil and—at the cost of some starvation—from its peasants. The Soviet leadership has chosen to eat its way through its natural grain exports since 1929. And it has converted Russia into a country which may import more farm produce than it exports.

A second factor made Stalin's policy workable. Despite its relative poverty, by Western European and American standards, the Russian standard of food consumption as of 1928 could be compressed and reduced without actually causing chronic starvation. This is another margin which the Russian Communists exploited.

Third, Russia began in 1929 with a sufficient industrial capacity to avoid the need for an expanding foreign trade during its First Five Year Plan. It could produce a high proportion of what it needed for industrialization from its own plants. A decline in agricultural exports in Russia did not, therefore, make industrialization impossible.

For twenty-five years, then, Russia has been able to afford an unproductive and enslaved agriculture. Now, however, history is beginning to catch up with Stalin's ruthless decisions of 1929. The population in Russia has continued to rise and people have moved into cities. It is clear to Moscow's planners that the smoldering, unproductive peasantry is a serious and costly problem. No issue since Stalin's death has used up as much Soviet newsprint as the agricultural problem. It does not threaten immediate crisis in Russia; but it is evident that the leaders in Moscow no longer feel the same complacency that Stalin did about the consequences of collectivized agriculture.

Much the same is true of Communist-dominated Eastern Europe. There, too, Communist collectivization policies, although somewhat less drastic than Stalin's, have broken the link between the peasant's effort and his return; and agricultural output is sagging. There, too, in the post-Stalin period the newspapers are filled with stories of agricultural shortage and low productivity.

It is symptomatic of the agricultural decline in Russia and Eastern Europe that, after breaking from Moscow in 1948, Tito almost immediately began to back-track on collectivization. There is every evidence that Tito learned rapidly that a system which does not appeal to the peasant's self-interest is a costly totalitarian luxury.

The men in Moscow face, then, a significant dilemma. They know that high agricultural productivity demands that the Russian and Eastern European peasant be given real incentives to work hard and to produce efficiently. More than that, these concessions must appear to the peasant as permanent enough to inspire him to change his whole outlook on production. He has been beaten down and imprisoned for many years by the Communist leadership. He knows all too well the usual tricks of stick and carrot. His productivity cannot be turned on and off like an electric light switch.

But if the peasant is to be given stable incentives, Moscow has to accept two major consequences: (1) The degree of political and social control in the countryside must be lifted so that the peasant can enjoy an important degree of individual freedom. (2) Goods must be produced which the peasant wants to buy and can buy with what he earns. This means that the amount of production going into heavy industry and armaments must be relatively reduced in favor of consumers' goods. Together these decisions involve, if they are taken—and they have not yet been taken—a significant reversal of political, social, and economic policies which Communism has systematically followed wherever it has seized power.

At present Communist leadership in Moscow and Eastern Europe has acknowledged that the problem exists; but it has drawn back from a fundamental solution. Moscow has by no means decided to reverse the process of collectivization and to give the peasant the environment and the incentives he requires if food is to be produced efficiently on the desired scale. Nevertheless the discussion in the Soviet and satellite press reflects a recognition that for the long pull the situation of agriculture under Communism is unsatisfactory, even dangerous to the leadership.

Thus the Russian and Eastern European peasant has demonstrated that he cannot be quickly converted into a rural industrial worker according to Marx's formula, even by the full power of a modern totalitarian state. As Mitrany concluded:

> Marx's analysis of the evolution of agriculture has nowhere been proved right; his prescription for the organization of agricultural production has never come to be practiced as part of a normal economic evolution. The Marxist view of the political standing of the peasants has been made ridiculous by the dependence of the Communist advance on the peasants' revolutionary impetus and action; while its expectation of a natural alliance between proletariat and poor peasants, as a result of class division in the village, has, in spite of much Communist effort, nowhere come to pass.

The Attack on the Chinese Farmer

IN THE Far East the Chinese peasant is beginning to make a similar demonstration. This is a different and more serious matter than it is in Europe, where the problem does not threaten an immediate major crisis. Russia and Eastern Europe can, in extremity, produce enough and export enough industrial goods to buy food abroad. To some extent this is what Russia is now doing. It is, of course, grotesque that Russia and Eastern Europe should become food-importing areas; but the situation in China is, from the Communist point of view, vastly more dangerous.

There, too, the Communists, once they had effectively seized power, turned on their peasant support much as Stalin did in 1929. They made good their promise to redistribute land from the rich to the poor peasant in 1949-50. But they did not redivide the land because they wanted a nation of small independent proprietors. They did it in order to wreck the social, economic, and political power of the village gentry and other middle-class elements in China whose income depended on the ownership of substantial amounts of land. In this way, agents of Peking supplanted the complex and diffuse authorities of village life.

When this job was done they began immediately to push the peasant into collectivized farms. The Chinese Communist model is drawn from Eastern Europe rather than the Soviet Union. Its key institution is the producers' co-operative, from whose total output a family receives a share. At first the share is computed according to the amount of land and equipment the family puts into the co-operative, plus the amount of labor contributed. But it is official policy that shares will rapidly become proportional to current labor, not past capital contribution. The family will then lose not only its capital but also its feeling of connection between output and effort. It is a share in the total that each family gets—a total averaging the vigorous and weak, the conscientious and lazy.

The producers' co-operative is buttressed by policies which require the peasant to sell all his marketable output to the government at low fixed prices; which sterilize his cash in government banks; and which limit what he can buy, through the spreading monopoly of government stores. There is not the slightest doubt that the Chinese peasant dislikes this collectivized organization of agriculture; and there is not the slightest doubt that the Chinese Communists have the intention and the ability to complete the process of collectivization they have begun. The latest statements indicate that they expect to place more than half of China's peasants in producers' co-operatives by the end of this decade; and the government monopoly of the grain trade is already a universal fact.

WHY have the Chinese Communists betrayed their peasant supporters? Why are they taking risks with the level of agricultural output in China by damaging the peasant's incentive to produce?

They have launched this policy of collectivization for two reasons. First, they feel that unless the peasant is collectivized he will not be under Communist political control. Some 80 per cent of the people of China are peasants; that is, about 500,000,000 people are in rural families. In such a nation a free agriculture means virtually a free people. And this would be a denial to the Communists of their victory. Second, the Communists have decided to build, as a matter of over-riding priority, a heavy industry base: both to supply their armed forces and to guarantee that China can later continue to industrialize out of its own resources. This requires that the government control intimately the agricultural output of the country and that the government be in a position to use it for its own purposes: to sell abroad for arms and machinery; to feed the army, the Communist administration, its horde of men in forced labor, and the rapidly growing cities. The government in Peking does not appear confident that it can achieve this control over output unless collective farms are installed. Peking appears willing, in short, to risk less output if it can fully control what there is.

This is a greater risk for Communist China in the 1950s than it was in the Soviet Union during the 1930s. Whereas the Soviet Union could achieve its industrialization plan with a 20 per cent decline in agricultural output, China requires something like a 10 per cent increase. This is so because, unlike the Soviet Union, Communist China must increase its foreign trade to industrialize and because population is growing so rapidly in China. Peking now claims a population increase of 2 per cent per year, which means an extra twelve million mouths to feed.

What will happen if agricultural output does not increase by 10 per cent? We should be quite clear that up to a point the Chinese Communists can and will balance their books with starvation. In fact, to some extent, this happened last spring and is likely to happen again next spring. A Communist control apparatus can handle a high degree of discontent; and starvation is chronic in China.

There are, however, two dangers to Peking. First, a sustained failure of output to increase or a substantial decrease could create so vast a hunger in China that even a Communist control system could not prevent some kind of crisis. Second, a demonstration that Communist techniques in Asia lead to chronic starvation could damage or destroy the powerful belief in underdeveloped areas that Communism holds the key to rapid economic growth. It is this belief which is one of Communism's greatest assets in the Cold War: in Southeast Asia, in the Middle East, in Africa, and even in Latin America.

Revolution by Consent

THE most important conclusion at which I have arrived from three years' immersion in the study of Communism is this: it lies within the capabilities of the United States and the Free World to shatter the belief in Communism as the unique method for rapid development. And we can do this over the next decade—by, say, 1965.

The faith and judgment which lie behind this conclusion stem not only from knowledge of how the peasant's human response to Communist methods has affected agricultural output. This conclusion is supported by results already achieved in the Free World, notably in India, by the techniques of freedom, the method of individual consent.

India has begun its attempt to industrialize in a way exactly opposite to Communist China. China is investing in heavy industry. India has plowed its scarce capital, for the First Five Year Plan, primarily into agriculture. China is forcing its peasants into collectives, by threat and force. India is trying to induce the peasant to improve his methods, to increase the use of chemical fertilizers, to install new irrigation facilities, to double-crop his land. All this is done painstakingly by education and example.

THE results thus far are remarkably hopeful. The substantial increase in agricultural output planned in India for the First Five Year Plan has been achieved in three years; and the evidence is that a constructive chain reaction is sweeping the Indian countryside, far beyond the demonstration villages. The returns are not yet in; but there is a distinct possibility that this truth will become evident: in underdeveloped areas, starting from scratch, with a population predominantly made up of peasants, the method of consent is not only right morally, it is right technically as well.

A Free World economic program, with strong U. S. support, might demonstrate this simple truth, notably in the competition between India and Communist China. These two great nations are simultaneously attempting a radical transformation. Over the next decade they plan to put themselves in a position where economic growth will be relatively automatic. Throughout Asia, and throughout the vast underdeveloped portions of the world, the relative performance of Communism and Democracy at this monumental task will be closely watched and weighed.

Even Communist totalitarianism cannot afford enough policemen to follow the peasant about in his daily round and make him produce what economic growth requires. The devices of a police state, which work with tragic efficiency in urban areas, adapt with difficulty to the countryside.

In short, the fact that Marx was a city boy gives the Free World the chance to destroy in the next decade the myth that only Communist brutality can raise an underdeveloped area into self-sustaining growth. And if that myth is dissipated, the chance that Communism will gain power in the underdeveloped areas, whose destiny will determine the long-run balance in the world's power, will be much reduced, if not once and for all eliminated.

Dear Miss King:

Many thanks for your letter of February 21st.

I am indeed honored by your gracious invitation to visit The Sirovich Day Center, and hope that one day my heavy broadcasting schedule will permit me to do so.

May I say that the organization seems to be a very worthwhile project.

Thank you again for taking the time to write to me as you did.

New York City.

Dear Mr. Murrow:

I am interested in your program and am an avid listener. I wonder if you are aware of the Day Center program for older people? Some day I hope you will pay us a visit. I believe you would enjoy the experience.

The Sirovich Day Center was opened on December 19, 1949, with 34 members. Today there are more than 800 with 32 nationalities represented. The evemage daily attendance is around 250. There are no fees. The only requirement for membership is that a person must be 60 or over and all are welcome regardless of race, creed, color or income.

On a constructive basis the Center is a substitute for the loss of a work day, loss of routine, loss of companions, etc. It is supported by voluntary contributions through a Board of Directors and with the cooperation of the Department of Welfare, which provides the professional staff.

You will find this a most exciting and vital place to visit and seeing the senior citizen in an environment and setting which clearly shows the cultural contribution they are making, not only to themselves and the community, but to the world at large. Our program is not recreati nal but rather cultural and educational.

Besides a Symphony Orchestra which has played over radio on on TV, and play for charitable institutions and hospital shut-ins, we have a very successful Glee Club which has staged a number of similar performances. Our Drama Group, among other plays, has presented "The Mikado" and last year presented "The Silver Whistle" on Broadway. This year, and also aimed for Broadway, the group will offer "Uncle Harry."

Enclosed is some material which further explains our program as well as three articles by Mr. Harry Levine, Consultant on Aging to the Department of Welfare, and who is in charge of all 16 Day Centers in the city. The paper, "Psychological Aspects of a Day Center Program," was one that I read at the Gerontological Congress in London last Summer.

We would consider it an honor and a privilege if you c uld pay us a visit, and I am hoping to hear from you in the affirmative.

Sincerely,

(Miss) Frances King, Director

DAY CENTERS FOR OLDER PEOPLE

A PUBLIC SERVICE

In its concern for the welfare of the people, public welfare agencies have recognized the existence of special needs of specific groups of the population. The Department field workers became increasingly aware of the problems of older people. They observed that many lived alone in furnished rooms with few or no family ties, almost friendless, without interests, living an existence divorced from community activities. An occasional park bench conversation with strangers was the total extent of social contacts for a large proportion of these older people.

Visits by welfare workers were prolonged because of the older clients' loneliness and need for relationship. These same needs found expression in excessive demands for attention. The clinic visit became an escape from the furnished room and the opportunity for companionship.

The Department of Welfare of New York City established the William Hodson Community Center, the first day center for older people, in April, 1943. Here was the opportunity for the expression and satisfaction of real needs. Here was the opportunity for participation and continued growth.

Since 1943, with an ever-growing increase in the aging population, the pioneering work of the Department of Welfare of New York City has been extended. There are now fourteen Day Centers in Greater New York operated by the Department of Welfare in cooperation with private agencies and interested citizens, with 6,000 participating members. These fourteen Centers have separate Boards of Directors, each developed within the community which the Center serves. The programs are centrally supervised and coordinated by the Department of Welfare, which also provides the staff. In general, the space is furnished by a private agency, the staff by the public agency, and the operating expenses are raised within the community by each Board which is composed of both lay and professional people. The program pattern established by the Department is flexible, with the character of each Center determined by such variables as type of membership (nationality, cultural background, economic level, age, etc.), available space and facilities, and financial support.

What Is a Day Center for Older People?

A Day Center for Older People is an agency providing a daily, professionally supervised, planned activity program for persons sixty years of age and older. The program offers its members the opportunity for productive and satisfying use of the free, unused day-time hours, to overcome the empty and lonely hours left by loss of employment, business, household duties or family responsibilities. Essentially, it is a mental health and adult education program which promotes the social and emotional adjustment of the older person, giving him companionship and activity in an environment favorable to his continued growth. It is a program based on the recognition that physical, mental and emotional activity are primary human needs. It is a program which is growing with the reassuring implication that the older person has the strength and capacity to use it effectively.

ORGANIZATION AND OPERATION

The organization and operation of each of the fourteen Day Centers in New York City has differed considerably and, despite the central administration, there is wide variation in the character and tone of each. The variables are location, financial support, space, facilities, character of Board and of the members of the Center, staff and community support; the program is influenced and modified by these elements. The one constant factor is the purpose.

The problems of our aging population are so extensive that it is felt in every community and so acute that it is beyond the scope of private agencies alone. It is important for the public agency to take a leading role to establish a Day Center Program, stimulating and initiating community support and private agency participation. The public agency approaches influential and interested members of the community as well as other public and private agencies, apprising them of the problem and inviting their participation at an organizational meeting. The invitation of a person prominent in civic affairs to address the group awakens community interest and the attendant publicity reaches prospective Board members, Center members, and volunteers. At this preliminary meeting, the discussion includes not only a statement of the problem, but suggests the ways and means of coping with it. From it follows the formal organization of the Board of Directors.

I. Board of Directors

The organization of a Board of Directors, composed of lay and professional people, is the first step in the establishment of a Day Center. The group organizes as a corporation with constitution, by-laws, officers and committees. The committees, appropriately designated:

1. Determine need in the area (the number of older people, neighborhood of greatest concentration, location and affiliations if possible of the older residents who are the older people, etc.)

2. Acquire suitable quarters

3. Secure funds

4. Plan publicity

5. Prepare plans for program, staff, equipment, etc.

Detailed references to Board committee work will be found under the specific headings which follow. A well-organized, interested Board of Directors can be most effective in the successful operation of a Day Center. A Board of approximately 30 members has been found to be desirable.

II. Financing

It has been indicated that the New York City program is supported by public and private sources. The staff is provided by the Department of Welfare; operating costs are carried by the Boards of Directors who are responsible for raising funds in the community. Foundations have been helpful in giving financial support for either general use or for a specific activity or service. For example, generous grants from the New York Foundation made possible the first camp vacation program for older people. Donations in kind and in services provide a part of program materials, and the members themselves often contribute directly or through program activities (sale of articles made in workshop and sale of tickets for dramatic and musical presentations by the membership).

III. Location and Building

Every effort is made to establish the Day Center in an accessible part of the community where the need has been demonstrated, so that the members are able to make the fullest use of its facilities. The proximity of the service helps potential members overcome their resistance and fear of new experience and encourages continuity of attendance. A building with adjacent outdoor space or proximity to a public park is desirable. The premises occupied by the Center may be sought from the following sources:

1. Housing Projects
2. Schools and Libraries
3. Unused Buildings
4. Unused Business Premises
5. Settlement Houses
6. Community Centers
7. Churches
8. Homes for Aged
9. Private Residences

Ideally, the Center should occupy its own facility, specifications designed for its purpose with an understanding of the needs of the membership.* Older people should not be put in a position of competition with younger people, nor should they be made to feel as intruders in premises planned and used for other groups. It is preferable that they are not involved in the quicker, turbulent pace of young people. Already displaced in the family and community, they need a place of their own, as a symbol, an affirmation of their integrity and independence. In their own quarters, available on a full-day basis, they are free to come and go at will; they develop a sense of belonging; in their pride of group-possession, they become active participating members; among people their own age they have a greater ease of expression.

The space should include several rooms, although one very large room may be used with a dividing arrangement of furniture and equipment. Minimal requirements for an adequate program are:

1. Lounge area
2. Activity rooms
3. Kitchen
4. Office
5. Toilets
6. Storage space

*Such plans have already been prepared by Architect Stanley Rosenberg of New York City.

Kitchen facilities may be simple, for tea and coffee service, or extensive for the preparation of a noontime meal. The lounge may serve as auditorium, dining area, game room and party room. The program will determine the kind of activity rooms which are required but should definitely include a workshop and a quiet room for library, meeting room and classroom. The convenient location of toilet facilities is a major consideration for older persons. Office space should provide a measure of privacy, both for office work and for interviews and counseling. Storage space is needed for program materials, for food supplies and for the vast miscellany of donations from an interested community which may be useful at any time either for the Center itself or for individual members.

Supplies, furniture and equipment are readily obtained as donations from the community, but comfort, attractiveness and efficiency should not be wholly sacrificed for economy. In the shop, good power machines and power tools reduce the expenditure of energy and give more finished results, thereby encouraging members to use the facilities.

IV. Staff

Work with older people is a new frontier in social work. There is an initial need for staff in this field. Since the public agency is so extensively concerned with the problems of older people in public assistance programs and, since it has a large staff, assignment of personnel may be its major contribution to the Day Center Program.

The services of at least one professional group worker who can supervise staff members and volunteers may well mean the difference between a social club and a Day Center program. Private agencies housing a Day Center may provide helpful supervision when a trained worker is not available for full-time service in the program of older persons.

Adequate staff coverage would require one worker for every fifty members, although the potentiality for an enriched program is increased by a larger staff. Nevertheless, centers have been successfully maintained with fewer workers.

A corps of volunteers recruited from the community provides a necessary addition to center personnel. Both group workers and volunteers with special skills in arts,crafts, dramatics, etc., are invaluable. The help these workers contribute in the kitchen, office, at parties and outings is equally valuable. All must share one quality in common — an acceptance of older persons which can be communicated to them.

V. Program - Activities and Services

It is our belief that activity as a primary human need expressed physically, mentally and emotionally, is basic to the older as well as the younger person and is fundamental in preserving his personality. The continued use of abilities and experience through the Center group activity program provides the essential feelings of adequacy, accomplishment and usefulness.

The choice of which activities will be part of the Day Center program is determined by the interests and capacities of the members. Older people are capable of deriving a sense of achievement from a diversified activity program which affords not only the opportunity to continue former interests and skills but also provides the satisfaction of new experience.

C. Membership Management

We recognize that the older person has experiences, skills and capacities and can do most things himself. This ability extends to the management of the Center, through a self-governing organization with elected officers, constitution and committees. Committees are most important to activate as many members as possible. Even the smallest job within the Center can have an appropriate official title, and most of these should be elective positions. Staff members should do only what the members cannot do. Their real function is to advise, enable and channel the interest and strengths of the members; to act as catalytic agent.

Center members have accepted responsibility in the work of committees such as:

1. Kitchen Committee - planning and preparation of luncheon served at nominal fee

2. Hospitality Committee - reception of guests and new members

3. Waiters' Committee - serving refreshments at parties

4. Visiting Committee - visiting homebound and hospitalized members and shut-in older people referred by agencies and community

5. Entertainment Committee - planning party programs and special events

6. House Committee

7. Civil Defense Committee

8. Executive Committee - consists of representatives of each special interest group and elected officers, including:

   President
   Vice Presidents
   Treasurer
   Recording Secretary
   Corresponding Secretary
   Sergeant-at-Arms
   Fire Marshal
   Registrar

"For the officers, as well as the membership, the institution of self-government has proved one of the...effective means of stimulating these older people to make use of their capacities. It has developed leadership, initiative, responsibility. It has served to focus attention and increase identification with the affairs of (the Center) in even the least participating members." (1)

D. Services to the Community

Through the Center, the older person has opportunities for community work whereby his own feelings of usefulness and accomplishment are reinforced. They have contributed to community welfare in hospitals, old age homes, nursing homes, and children's institutions. They prepare bandages and dressings, feed hospital patients, escort the blind, provide companionship and perform various services for shut-ins. The music and choral groups entertain outside the Center, and shop groups make and repair toys for children and gifts for disabled veterans. Simultaneously with their deeper involvement in Center activities, they are returning to the community with a renewed assurance of their value.

E. Counseling Service

The Center has been especially effective in providing a counseling service for its members. In a friendly, permissive and familiar atmosphere the member who freely chooses his daily Center activities also moves more easily to the counselor when faced with an unresolved personal problem. Counseling is an integral part of the total Center program.

The difficulties faced by the members for which they need the Center's counseling service involve finances and employment, health, housing, family relationships, personal adjustments, etc. The counseling itself may be simple statement of facts, as in matters relating to social security or public assistance, or it may concern some personal problem which will require extended planning and counseling.

VI. Services from the Community

The Day Center utilizes other community services in the development of a rich and satisfying program. Public libraries assist in setting up center libraries; they have exhibited to the public the handicrafts and paintings of center members; they have invited center participation in their own adult education programs; The Board of Education provides qualified teachers for English and Citizenship classes. Health educators of the Department of Health have arranged lecture series with physicians discussing the various aspects of medicine and hygiene which particularly pertain to older people. Nutritionists of city departments offer group counseling on nutritional needs and food preparation. The center membership is frequently invited to be guests at public and private places of interest and entertainment; for the first time, many of the older people are using the community facilities which they helped to build.

VII. Membership

Participants in the program come from various sources: by direct invitation, by announcements, by posters, and by advance notices published in the local newspapers. Cooperating agencies such as hospitals, schools, libraries, churches, the Social Security Board and the public welfare agency itself can make the new service known to the older people they serve. Local club groups and fraternal organizations are invited to refer their own members or parents and grandparents of their members to the Day Center. In communities where it is possible to canvass from door-to-door, as in a housing project, volunteers can extend personal invitations.

At the formal opening to which potential members and representatives of community organizations have been invited, volunteers can bridge the feelings of loneliness by the creation of an atmosphere of friendliness and warmth, introducing people to each other and showing them through the facilities which will be theirs to use and enjoy. After brief announcements to explain the purpose of the Center, the days and hours it will be open, and the activities which it offers, the serving of refreshments will set a party tone to the gathering. A musical program which can start community singing and dancing is a helpful device.

A guest register will provide a mailing list for later invitations to the more reticent or fearful older person, and there should be arrangements for the registration of those who wish to join the Center at once.

The opening day usually brings the smallest part of the total membership, for the largest single source of new participants is by word of mouth - by invitation from an active member to a neighbor, a friend, or to the stranger who sits beside him in a bus.

CONCLUSION

The value to the community of the Day Center for Older People is implicit in the degree to which the Day Center Program promotes the preservation of personality and mental health. Since the major emphasis is prevention, the group activities are geared to arrest and to prevent the deterioration that comes from the older person's feelings of insecurity and rejection. He is given opportunity for activities which make possible a sense of adequacy and accomplishment. In a community that provides acceptance, companionship and warmth there is fulfillment.

In evaluating the Day Center Program, many positive changes are observed in the individual member. He moves from his isolation into a community. He has a place to go each day--a reason to dress and prepare himself for association with other people. He has a place to go--a reason for going. He has something to do--something which interests him and which he does at his own pace. No longer isolated, he is physically active and mentally stimulated. He has the opportunity for the continuation or renewal of meaningful social relationships. He learns to approach reality situations, accepting and adjusting to his aging in a setting with his contemporaries which promotes change and growth.

Isolation can extend even to the older person living within a family group. Too often, the parent or grandparent demands and competes for an excess of attention and affection. Through the Center, he becomes an active part of the fabric of the community, using his daytime hours effectively and with satisfaction. He has a new source of emotional gratification and spares himself rejection by the family which resents the demands of emotional dependence. As he becomes less demanding, his family more readily gives him affection and relationship.

As the senior citizen becomes a healthier personality through his integration in the life of the Center, he contributes to the well-being of the total community. With purpose, with direction, with activity in his life, there is no longer the pattern of inertia that produces physical and emotional deterioration. There is a lessened need for institutional care. The rate of admission of Center members to institutions is considerably lower than the rate for the same age group in the general community. This is true not only for mental hospitals, but also for general hospitals, homes for the aged, and nursing homes. The Center member becomes a community member and is less anxious to withdraw to a completely protected dependent environment. Community funds are better spent for a preventive program than for the costly construction and maintenance of additional homes and hospitals.

A study of clinic attendance by a group of the members for a period before and after joining a Center disclosed the fact that from the time of membership there was a 50-70% reduction in the total number of clinic visits. It was also found that the extent to which these clinic visits were reduced for any particular individual closel correspond to the extent to which he has become involved in the activities of the Center. In fact, it is sometimes necessary to prod the members to attend clinics if they become over-absorbed in Center life.

The clinic habitue who sought companionship in the waiting room at the hospita now found it at the Center. The attention he demanded from clinic workers and medica staff has gained in a greater degree from his accomplishments at the Center. There was no longer the total preoccupation with ills, real and imagined. With a membershi which was such a large percentage of cardiac and circulatory disorders and special dietary requirements, the Day Center provides health and nutrition education and suggests habits of living that will promote the physical well-being of the members. Those members who do have real disabilities can still use remaining strengths constructively in a Day Center setting.

In a democratic society, public agencies are concerned with the total well-being of all individuals, and they have recognized that physical maintenance alone is insufficient. This broad concept of public welfare has been extended to all, with the single exception of older persons. An ever-increasing segment of the population, they remain a deprived group. The problem has grown to the extent that it is part of every community, so large in scope that public agency participation is necessary. The acceptance of this responsibility holds promise for broad social and economic gains.

COMMUNITY PROGRAMS FOR THE ELDERLY

By HARRY A. LEVINE

Old age is in fact a quality of mind and body whose onset varies from individual to individual rather than a mere quantity expressed by a term of duration applicable to all.
-NUFFIELD REPORT

The purpose of society is the elevation of human life. Step by step, society has taken to itself the responsibility for public health, public education, public welfare, the care of the defective, the aged, the dependent, and the unemployed; and in the area of recreation, the provision of free parks, playgrounds, libraries, and museums. More and more, with the higher development of our civilization, we are including education in the helpful use of leisure time and the provision of means for such use.

Recreation and activity programs for the older person are peculiarly a function of democratic society. In his lifetime, the older person has made his contribution - given us his energy, his skill, and his children. We owe him the possibility of living his later years without frustration and rejection. We owe him the opportunity to prolong his usefulness - to contribute his energy and his wisdom to the life around him.

RECREATIONAL RESOURCES

While society has largely accepted responsibility for the physical welfare of the older person, little consideration has been given to activity that will give him a feeling of usefulness and belonging, of adequacy and accomplishment, of acceptance and understanding - the things that tend to preserve the personality.

The institutions and resources for the older person that are presently available are limited. They have in no way kept pace with the increase in the number of older people, and with their strength and vitality. For the most part, they have paid little heed to the emerging concepts in the field of gerontology. These institutions were organized for a shorter life span and the different needs of an earlier era; they have changed little, despite the fact that the tired and worn old man or woman has been replaced by an aging person of considerably greater potential, with a whole set of new values, needs, and problems.

In the last decade the very numbers of older unemployed people drew attention and forced recognition of their presence. The recent interest in recreation and activity programs is a result of that recognition.

In many cities, councils of social agencies have special committees to work with the problems of the aging. They have stimulated the organization of a number of clubs and club programs. New York, Philadelphia, Chicago, Cleveland, Detroit, Washington, Milwaukee, and San Francisco have clubs sponsored by social agencies; some are co-sponsored with national organizations, like the National Council of Jewish Women; some in co-operation with settlement houses and community centers.

Settlement houses and community centers are very much interested, and are developing club programs. A few are developing day center programs.

Churches, synagogues, and other religious organizations have an important contribution to make and are becoming aware and interested, but the facilities are not often conducive to free and easy associations. Church rules about smoking and playing cards are restrictive; also, janitorial service and heat seem to be a primary factor for many churches.

Some homes for the aged have recognized the value of creative and recreational programs in maintaining the strengths of the older resident. They have arts and crafts, choral groups, entertainment and occupational therapy programs. They are only now becoming aware of the possibilities of extending services to, and of their responsibility for, the nonresident as well as the resident older person.

Libraries and museums are co-operating; Cleveland has its Live Long and Like It Club. Libraries plan book clubs and reading clubs, lectures and discussions, with hobbies and health as the major interest.

A few universities in this country, such as the Institute for Human Adjustment at the University of Michigan, sponsor courses and institutes on aging. Some school boards, like the Board of Education in New York City, sponsor courses and adult centers. They have opened some of the public schools in the evening for recreation and activity programs. Some park departments and home economic departments sponsor hobbies, crafts, gardening, lectures, and educational activities.

The Golden Age Clubs

There are some golden age clubs sponsored by business and professional groups; a few have been started independently by older people and are completely autonomous, like the grandmothers' clubs. Most are open to all, regardless of race, color, or creed; others have been formed with particular cultural and professional interests in mind. There may be as many as three hundred clubs in the United States. All clubs provide social contacts; many include lectures, discussion groups, motion pictures, and television.

Noncommercial recreation for the older person is best exemplified by these golden age clubs, meeting once a week or once a month for a few hours in an afternoon or evening. They are a blessing for those who have other activities during the day; they can and often do supplement work or household chores. In some cases they are a substitute for membership in societies and organizations which the old people can no longer afford. They provide companionship and have cultural value. They are a valuable addition to recreational resources.

The Day Center

A recent development and a new resource - one which recognizes the broader needs of the older person - is the day center. The Department of Welfare in New York City developed the first day center in this country some eight years ago. There are now twelve such programs, open from nine to five o'clock, five days a week, in New York City and a number in other cities in this country. The idea of the centers has spread to England, Canada, France, and Australia.

The centers have adopted the knowledge, the techniques, and the programs developed by the recreation field. They have found that the values and benefits accruing to younger people in such organized programs are applicable to older persons They recognize that recreation is a basic human need,and the facilities are planned accordingly.

Facilities in the centers include lounges for talk and reading, large rooms for mass activities, playrooms or play areas for cards, checkers, and chess, workshops, meeting rooms, classrooms, and libraries. A number have darkrooms for photography; one has a poolroom. Some have yards for outdoor games. A kitchen is part of every center, for lunch and refreshments and to make parties possible.

The members of the centers sing, dance, and play cards and games. They make friends. They visit each other. Some even find romance; there have been eleven marriages in one center to date. They visit museums and places of interest regularly. They celebrate each other's birthdays once a month. They plan boat rides and picnics, and celebrate holidays. They have motion pictures, bazaars, and exhibitions of their work. They paint, write, and participate in editing magazines. They write their own plays and act in them. They make clothes, hats, jewelry, and costumes for plays. They have classes in woodwork, copper, leather, ceramics, English, sculpture, poetry, music and music appreciation, elocution, and acting. They maintain old skills or develop new skills and interests. They have discussion groups and regular information programs on health and geriatrics. The center becomes a major source of information. They have orchestras and choral groups. They do all the arts and crafts. The retired or unemployed older person may well bring a renaissance of folk art and craft to America.

There seems to be no limit to the interest and activity that mey be developed. Interest can be aroused that will hold groups of different cultural levels. There are unlimited areas for activity, both intellectual and physical, for continued personal development.

Staff members include caseworkers, group workers, registered occupational therapists, and specialists in activities such as music, dramatics, carpentry, and arts and crafts. Counseling and casework are important areas of activity for the staff. A housing registry is maintained in some centers. Every center has developed a visiting committee of members who not only visit their own sick members but are extending this service to agencies in the community to visit shut-in older people.

Meeting the diversity of desires and needs of their members, these centers are planned as a constructive substitute for the loss of the workday. Members come and go freely. Most come all day, every day; some come two or three times a week. The centers are self-governing, with members carrying a considerable part of the responsibility for program planning and management. The centers are sponsored by public welfare agencies, voluntary agencies, interested citizens, or a combination of any of these.

Open Opportunities

Industry and unions have an unusual opportunity to contribute to the well-being of the older person and to themselves by establishing day centers for their retired workers. Along with furnishings for the usual activities, these centers should be provided with shop and laboratory equipment, tools and materials. This would stimulate and open up vast opportunities for the retired worker, permitting him to explore and develop some of his ideas that he could not bring to fruition in a busy work life - to invent new tools and make changes in those with which he has worked. He can maintain some of the elements of his job; it can yield a reward that is rich in satisfaction and possibilities for him. His skill, knowledge, and time are tremendous untapped resources that have untold possibilities. The knowledge and the time used in these work-related activities should net innovations and improvements which may make a lasting contribution to our economy.

There is a beginning movement, today, to have homes for the aged open their doors to the nonresident. Old age homes - with physical plants, facilities, and funds for the care of the aged - have a stake in the preventive as well as the custodial care of the older person. Some homes have accepted responsibility for the nonresident, through a home care program. The program is necessarily limited by the number of older people that can be served and the kind of services possible. However, a day center program, as part of the homes for the aged, can give service to additional hundreds in the homes. Multiform activity programs and related services, developed in the day centers, can enrich the lives of the resident and the home-care older person, as well as the nonresident in the community. The resident can continue contact with the community through a contemporary healthier, stronger, more dynamic, day center member. He can be stimulated to join the integrated and less dependent day center members in many activities. Mental health seems contagious and communicable. The day center can bring that to the home. It can participate in the life of the home. The visiting committee program can be extended to include services to the bedridden, visiting, reading to them, writing letters for them, and so forth.

THE DEEPER NEEDS

Golden age clubs and other community programs are a beginning movement of recognition and acceptance of the older person. They enrich the resources in the community for his recreation. His contemporaries in these clubs add to his enjoyment and friendships.

Actually, however, the aging person does not need to seek out contemporaries to find pleasure and entertainment in his leisure time. Loss of employment may separate him from the industrial part of community life, but it need not separate him from the recreational fabric of the community. Neither loss of work nor diminishing physical capacity need change his leisure-time activity much. By and large, he can continue with familiar activity and be part of the community that he knows. Much, if not all, of his leisure time is associated with the evening. He can continue to enjoy movies and go to concerts, lectures, and classes. He can participate in church activity and community center and settlement programs. He can listen to the radio, watch television, read, and visit relatives and friends.

Recreation, no matter how important and no matter how broadly used, is only one aspect of the activity needs of the older person. Occasional and short contacts, inherent in recreation, do not satisfy the deeper need for creative and purposeful activity and do not meet the basic biological and psychological needs of unemployed, unoccupied older persons.

Activity

Activity as a primary human need, expressed physically, mentally, and emotionally, is basic to the older as well as the younger person. It is fundamental in preserving the personality. Basically, the older person needs to fill in his unused day with activity that will continue to use his abilities and his experiences - activity that will give him a feeling of adequacy, accomplishment, and usefulness.

There is belief that continued employment is the answer; it may be for some. Industry may learn to utilize more older people longer, but the greater number of older people will be unemployed. They must experience and resign themselves to unemployment at some time in their life. Nor does employment take into consideration the women who lose responsibility for the family or household. Together they form the main body, the largest number, of older people. It is this large reservoir of older people that should be the major concern of the community.

Activity-charged preventive programs for this large group will reduce the pressure and the need for custodial and remedial institutions. Dr. MacCurdy, of the New York State Department of Mental Hygiene, sees the investment of taxpayers' money in prevention rather than in building more and bigger institutions for the aged.[1] The steady increase in psychiatric casualties may be an indication of what is in store for us if a positive program of prevention is not developed.

"Retirement to"

Then, there is the other concept that man need not work until he dies; that after contributing forty or fifty years to our industrial well-being, he should have the opportunity to enjoy the contribution he had made - to enjoy our culture, our civilization.

Most people have areas of competency which a busy work life did not permit to develop. With longer life expectency, with a stronger, less worn body, with a zest for life, with an interest in living and doing and a longer period in which to do nothing, deterioration will follow unless we develop preventive programs.

Most older people have experienced a great deal of frustration in their work life. Retirement could bring some satisfaction and happiness in later life if they could retire to rather than from something. Today, they have no choice.

Dr. E. G. Fried found that motivations for the frequently obsessive desire for work were the need to maintain self-esteem, the wish to escape from self-preoccupation and depression, and the striving to combat inner restlessness.[2] Folsom and Morgan found only a moderate correlation between work and happiness.[3] Conkey found, through interviewing, that the older person considered strong and varied interests and activity most important; economic security and independence were second.[4]

ACTIVITY AND MOTIVATION

In studies made by J. Landis of 450 persons 65 to 98 years of age, he found that all those who were active and had enough to do, including those even with hobbies, were better adjusted than others.[5] Folsom and Morgan found that hobbies and interesting activities are related to happiness. One-third of the persons studied found time hanging heavy on their hands; the busiest were happiest. Morgan also discusses the opinion of 55 older persons listed in Who's Who in America. They, too, emphasize the importance of having plenty to do in order to be happy.

Resources for activity are very limited. Community day centers for older people need to be developed to promote: (1) the social and emotional adjustment of the older person by making it possible for him to find companionship and create an environment that is favorable to his expansion; (2) the rehabilitation of personal efficiency by making it possible for the older person to make the maximum use of the capacities least impaired; and (3) community usefulness by creating a feeling of adequacy and accomplishment through an activity program.

A day center program utilizing the added time, the remaining strength, and the areas of competency of the older person during the hours usually spent at work can provide satisfactions associated with work, such as social usefulness, opportunities for self-expression, recognition, belonging, companionship, an established routine, something to look forward to. The center offers him choices in a climate that is conducive to experience and growth. Choices are fundamental. What the older person does from choice has meaning for him. At the center, activity is not just arts and crafts but motivation to do, movement, participation, and excitement. Time hangs heavy on his personality, particularly between nine and five o'clock, when everyone is busy and he feels separated from the main stream of life. Time can be a corroding factor with little to do, but in a center program on a planned basis, it becomes an added form of energy, replacing diminishing energy and vitality.

Decline does exist for the average, but individuals differ sufficiently to develop opportunities for creative activity for many members, particularly when decline in capacity may really be decline in motivation. Fatigue may easily be a defense mechanism - the result of being bored, useless, or not necessary to anyone. Even orientation or difficulty in accepting people may be due to lack of channels for emotional expression; for when put at ease and encouraged, such persons show unusual improvement and change.

THE GROUP FACTOR

The center recognizes the importance of group interaction in the life of an individual, and its tendency to be pattern-setting. The center uses the group to support and strengthen the individual; to help develop his talents and experiences or redirect them to find new uses, new goals, new roles of social usefulness. While physical fitness, psychological needs, and acquired habits and attitudes affect the choice of activity, the group can and does modify the motives, habits, and attitudes in continued effective participation.

5 J.T.Landis, "Social-Psychological Factors of Aging," Social Forces, Vol 20, No. 4 (May 1942), pp. 468-70.

Physical limitations may not change fundamentally, but changes in adjustment to such limitations are observed in group activity. The center helps the older person to live with his limitations, but, even more, it concentrates on his strengths as it utilizes them in activity programs. It affects his tempo and accomplishment. As he becomes more involved in a group program, his understanding of himself undergoes change. There is less and less effort to rationalize inadequacy and failure on a health level. Instead, there is discovery of skills and talents that he can appreciate and others will accept, and there is recognition of the idea that these skills and talents can grow, increasing his feeling of adequacy and accomplishment. Integrating the older person in group activity enables him to recognize that others around him have equal limitations and are utilizing the strengths they have to achieve and create.

As the individual becomes more integrated in the group, there is noticeable day-to-day expansion which, in itself, is energy created through the group. In a group setting he is helped to develop a definite interest in purposeful activity, which he is stimulated to follow systematically. Energy may be increased by using it. The more the group accept responsibility, the more they participate. The more they participate, the more easily they learn. The more they learn, the more they retain what they learn.

Acceptance, recognition, attention, relationships, make for a steady recovery from fear, loneliness, and frustration. There are members whose chief preoccupation was with their health and visits to clinics, who are now more discriminating in their visits to clinics. In one center there was a drop of 70 per cent in clinic attendance after six months of membership. In a recent study of the visual acuity of sixty members of the Hodson Center by psychologists and ophthalmologists of the United States Public Health Service, it was found impossible for a number of the members to see; yet they have not been limited in their activities. The same was found in a survey of some thirty members who had cardiac conditions. In a number of instances, their physicians insisted that the patients were too sick to be out of bed; yet they attended the center regularly. The obvious conclusion is that the adjustment to decline in capacity or a physical handicap depends on more than strictly organic factors.

CONCLUSION

In a democracy it should be possible for the later years to be less of a struggle and to be filled with some satisfactions in accomplishment and creativity. Given the opportunity, the older members of our society can contribute to our cultural well-being. The Grandma Moses' are not unique; they can be the rule, rather than the exception.

The constructive use of man's later years is possible if we can give him a sense of achievement, lessen failures in his efforts, and develop possibilities compensating for impaired capacity. To do that, we need to evolve an activity program in a day center that will include medical, psychological, and psychiatric facilities, as well as group work, casework, and personal counseling. Such a center can constructively affect the characteristics of the older person. The enormous amount of unused time holds untold possibilities of cultural enrichment for the individual and society. Society must provide the opportunities for the constructive use of time and energy. It must enable all to fulfill the promise of growth and achievement offered in the prolonged life of man.

Harry A. Levine, New York City, is director of the Special Services for the Aged in the New York City Department of Welfare, He is founder of the Hodson Center for older people, and has been in the forefront of the development of the center program for older people in this country. He has given institutes on aging at the New York State Conference of Social Work and the University of California, Berkeley, and is active in numerous organizations dealing with the problems of the aging.

AIMS AND PURPOSES

The Sirovich Day Center was opened December 19, 1949. The Center is open to all people regardless of race, color, creed or income. The ages of the persons attending the Center range from 60 to 96 with 75 the average. We have more than 800 members with an average daily attendance of over 200.

One of the primary aims of the Center is to develop among its members a spirit of fellowship wherein they may find, through activity programs, the cultural, educational and recreational interests so many people fail to develop throughout their lives. The member is given an opportunity to use and express skills and talents of which he may have been unaware. Through the interest, acceptance and recognition afforded him, he gains a feeling of adequacy, security and continued usefulness in the community. Our Center is self-governing. We have a democratic election once a year which was developed by the members.

The program in the Center is organized on a group work basis through Committees wherever possible, in order to encourage maximum participation. Some of the Committees are: The Ways and Means Committee responsible for drawing up the Constitution; the Clothing Committee which assumes the responsibility of checking hats and coats; the Hospitality Committee responsible for attendance taking, greeting new members and referring them to the Welcome Committee; the Visiting Committee to visit absent members. There is a Refreshment Committee, Sewing Committee, Arts and Crafts Committee, etc.

In addition to the above, we have a Travel Club which visits parks, museums and other points of interest. We also receive free theater tickets on a regular monthly basis and give these out as birthday gifts. We do not go outside of the Center for entertainment programs but use the talents which we find at the Center. We also have an extensive counselling service. The Center is sponsored by the Department of Welfare and the Wm. I. Sirovich Memorial Association, Inc.

We have, in the short time we have been open, affected the emotional and physical health of our members. On a constructive basis, we are a substitute for the loss of a work day and consider our project a Mental Health Program.

Harry A. Levine states in an article in The Annals of the American Academy Magazine, January 1952, that the Day Center helps to promote "the social and emotional adjustment of the older person by making it possible for him to find companionship and operate an environment that is favorable to his expansion; the rehabilitation of personal efficiency by making it possible for the older person to make the maximum use of the capacities least impaired; and community usefulness by creating a feeling of adequacy and accomplishment through an activity program."

NEW YORK HERALD TRIBUNE, MONDAY, JUNE 29, 1953

Retirement Enriched at Day Center

By Betty Wade

Being retired for many means plenty of leisure in which to do things long put off. For others it means the loneliness of having nothing in particular to do and no one to do it with.

Making retirement the rich, busy time of life is the science of geriatrics. In human terms, it is the finding of new or forgotten talents and the discovery that others care how a person looks and feels.

The Sirovich Day Center, 203 Second Ave., works out the problems of the senior citizens scientifically and humanly. Under the Department of Welfare and with the support of the William I. Sirovich Memorial Association and the Rose Sirovich Relief Society, the center welcomes every one over sixty, whether he wants to learn to dance or paint or just sit and look.

Miss Frances King, the director, helps to run things in a whirlwind way. On her desk recently were half a dozen lipsticks, stacked among the papers and folders. As she talked and ran a dozen activities, she doled them out to the women in the building who had been discovered without their lipstick on.

"Caring about appearance and clothes makes a big difference. And if some one else notices," Miss King smiled, "it's that much better."

Miss King explained that actual age can mean little if a person has found activities he enjoys.

A millinery course, music lessons, painting, sculpture, chess, languages—all are provided to any one who is interested. Only two things are taboo on the cheerfully painted premises. To enforce this rare negative rule, a sign hangs in the dining room: "We do not discuss religion or politics at the Sirovich Day Center."

Exercises Miss King considers an important part of the program. Daily, on the upstairs terrace, Miss King leads a group in exercises designed to promote good posture and breathing and unstiffening of the muscles.

A photography program is starting this week, taught by a man who just walked in and suggested the idea, offering some of his equipment. Miss King answered with an offer of an upstairs room for a darkroom.

The center, which is three and a half years old, is self-governed by the 700 members. To be a member, a person over 60 only has to visit for a while, decide he likes it, and request membership.

PROGRAM FOR AGED CALLED HEALTH AID

City's Day Center Services Seeks to Keep Elderly From Fast Deterioration

By MURRAY ILLSON

Thirty men and women from 60 to 85 years old were doing their daily calisthenics last week on the open air terrace of the William I. Sirovich Day Center at 203 Second Avenue, and they seemed to be having a good time. At least they did not have to be there. They could have been home sitting in a stuffy room or wandering the streets instead.

Miss Frances King, director of the center, which is near Thirteenth Street and is named for the late United States Representative from the lower East Side area, was calling out the directions:

"Stand up straight and hold your tummy in. Breathe deeply—ahhh. If you smile your exercise will do you good and keep you young. Come on now, Mrs. O'Leary; hands on your shoulders, Mr. Schwartzberg, elbows way up. Give me that cigarette, you can't exercise while you're smoking * * *"

Supported by the City

According to Harry A. Levine, director of the Department of Welfare's special services for the aged, the Sirovich Center is one of thirteen supported by the city for the benefit of its "senior citizens." New York, he said, now has about 1,000,000 persons over 60 years old, and of these 660,000 are over 65, and most of them are unemployed.

Mr. Levine declared that 60 per cent of those admitted to mental hospitals are over 60 years old. In the main, he said, they are men and women who cannot find jobs, have lost their "routine" and have become problems to their families. At 65 there are still fourteen years of life expectancy, and by 1960 the aged population will have increased by 20 per cent.

A social worker and authority on the problems of the aged, Mr. Levine is credited with founding the day-center program through the establishment ten years ago of the William Hodson Community Center in the old Bronx Borough Hall building at Tremont and Third Avenues. This center now has nearly 1,000 members of differing racial and religious backgrounds who elect their own officers in a self-governing administration, take disciplinary action when necessary, run their own cafeteria and visit those who are ill.

'This Is No Boondogle'

"Our principal purpose," Mr. Levine said, "is to keep our older citizens from deteriorating mentally and physically by keeping them busy and having them feel useful. This is no boondoogle. Remember that is costs about $1,800 a year for every person in a mental institution. Our program costs the city about $15 a year for each person taking part. There have been virtually no admissions to mental hospitals from any of our thirteen centers."

At the Sirovich Center, which provides a wide range of activities including an orchestra, glee club, classes in English, French and Italian, costume design, painting, dramatics, dancing and woodworking, there usually is a 50 per cent drop in clinic attendance after six months of participation in the program, Mr. Levine declared.

Miss King, who had completed giving the calisthenics, said that the center's eighteen-piece orchestra had played in hospitals and institutions all over the city. Its oldest member, she said, was an 82-year-old flutist who fifty years ago performed with the Metropolitan Opera Company.

Last week, members of the center put on a full-scale performance of Gilbert and Sullivan's "The Mikado" at Stuyvesant High School. Tickets were sold in the neighborhood at 50 cents each and $500 was realized from the performance, Miss King declared. She added that next year the troupe expected to perform in the Provincetown Playhouse in Greenwich Village "and after that, maybe Broadway."

Dear Mr. Murrow,

Perhaps it's presumptious but I'm afraid you may be embarrassed if I let your turn-down ride as I did my TV idea which was presented to your office a year ago.My admiration for you and my own self-respect prompts me to write a difficult letter with the hope that the result will be clear air between us.I have enough faith in the program,which has been further defined in my mind,and enough desire to work on it, that I think it will get on the air.

Knowing that the proposal was sitting on your desk and because I felt that when I was working for See It Now I could not take advantage of you I feel I've been a nudnick or a rabbit about getting to you --to talk over ideas and to express to you how much I appreciated working on SIN and how much I admired your work. I never understood really until I worked for SIN how your fine hand operated nor how important perspective was.

I hope you know that I would never do anything, intentionally, to add to your load. No one deserve a vacation more than you. I'll alway be grateful for you and Fred Friendly.

Best, always

Dear Ed:

When I learned of your vacation plans, I thought if you were driving to the Pacific northwest you might possibly be traveling through this section of the country, either going west or returning home. I would like very much to invite you to stop in Sioux City for what might be a welcome break in your long trip.

It occured to me that you might be planning your trip through this section, because of the completion of another of the great dams being constructed on the Missouri River -- this one at Gavins Point, 65 miles northwest of here. Beyond that, about 70 miles, is the Dam at Fort Randall. These Dams, and those above, will prevent a repetition of the great Missouri flood which I had the privilege of reporting for you in 1953, when you kindly invited me down to Omaha when you were there. Beyond the Dams, of course, you would hit the unique Bad Lands of South Dakota and the beautiful Black Hills section, and then go on into Yellowstone. Since Casey is to be with you, I assume this is a trip to include a little sugar-coated education along with the fishing that you are planning.

Although we would be delighted to "subject" you to a brief television interview, we would certainly understand your decision if it were in the negative. More important, we would like to have the opportunity of having you and your family enjoy some of the famous Sioux City steaks, of which there is no equal! And I'd be delighted to make any reservations that you might request and assist in any other way.

I'm hopeful that there will be an opportunity for you to be with us. Please advise me if I can be of assistance.

The annual Blue-Gray Football Game will be played here in Montgomery on December 31. As you know this game is one of the highlights of the year in the sports world and we are always delighted to be hosts here in the Cradle of the Confederacy.

This year's football program which is sponsored by the Lions Club will be designed with a television theme. They propose to use pictures of various top personalities in the radio and television field and would like to use a brief quote from the personality. We would appreciate your allowing us to use your picture in this program with the following quote:

> "Once again Montgomery, Alabama, the "Cradle of the Confederacy', plays host to the nation in presenting another football classic in the annual Blue-Gray game. I am sure that it will be another exciting sports event, and I feel sure that the thousands of spectators who witness this game in person will return to their homes assured that they have helped to forge closer the bonds that unite North and South into one great nation."

If you wish to change this quotation please feel free to do so. We already have a CBS publicity photo which we can use and would appreciate hearing from you by return mail or collect wire.

We were very happy to read about your great honor in receiving the top TV award. To the Board of Trustees and to you, Doctor Johnson, I want to express my deep appreciation for the honor that Temple University has given me in awarding me the honorary degree of Doctor of Literature. It is the first time I have ever received this degree.

As in the nine previous times that I have been awarded an honorary degree, I have mixed reactions about being made a Doctor of Literature. I am proud and grateful for the honor -- but I am embarrassed as I stand before the fine young men and women of Temple who today receive degrees that they have earned.

I have never earned a degree in that it was never my good fortune to go to college. Economic and other circumstances did not permit college attendance for me. I salute those of you who in spite of unfavorable economic circumstances have worked and earned your way to the degree you receive today. If I had my life to live over I would have done everything within my power to work my way through college to an earned degree.

But fate has been more than kind to me and has more than compensated for the college education that was denied me. I have been very lucky -- much more lucky than most people.

If there is anything that approaches being a substitute for luck it is education - the more education wisely applied the less luck one needs for achieving success. You young men and women are therefore most fortunate that you are armed with a fine education as you go forth to make your way in the world.

And in spite of the ominous, warlike threats on the world from the Kremlin, you are more fortunate than your predecessors during the past five years in that you will be entering a business, professional, vocational and political atmosphere that is less clouded with fear, suspicion, doubt and irresponsible accusations.

I am happy for you and for our country and our people that at long last the shining truth about the false accusers, the half-truth artists, the professional fabricators, the prevaricators-for-pay, the political demagogues who question the Americanism of anyone who may disagree with them -- that the shining truth about these irresponsibles is beginning to break through the dark and ugly clouds of doubt they have so evilly blown up.

Today I have been given by your greatly esteemed institution the honored degree of Doctor of Literature. If I have any one literary achievement that is associated with my name, I suppose that it is my Declaration of Conscience which I made in the Senate on June 1, 1950, nearly five years ago. I would like to think that the Declaration of Conscience was the major reason for you making me a Doctor of Literature today.

Reactions to the Declaration of Conscience varied. One reaction about the literary quality of it that I prize the most was that of a fellow Republican critic who, though denouncing its substance, privately praised it as one of the literary classics of our American history. His extravagance in such praise of the literary quality of the Declaration of Conscience I would have gladly traded for approval of the substance.

In all of the gravity of the Declaration of Conscience, there was one touch of humor - actually ridicule - levelled against me on it by a conservative columnist who has missed no opportunity to criticize me. In this instance, he gave me an Oscar Academy Award of some sorts by dubbing me "Snow White" and the seven other Senators who joined me on the Declaration the "Seven Dwarfs". Yes, he called the signers of the Declaration of Conscience "Snow White and the Seven Dwarfs."

Even I got a laugh out of this. I'm glad I did because one of the things a public official must retain is a sense of humor -- an ability to smile once and a while at yourself as well as to take yourself seriously.

I am sure that few, if any of you, ever heard of the Declaration of Conscience. I will not burden you with recalling much of it. In short, what I tried to do by it was to warn the United States Senate and the American people against the evils of extremism -- both extreme leftism and extreme rightism -- that guilty people should not be whitewashed and innocent people should not be smeared.

It was not popular and easy to make such a speech. The then Democratic President of the United States ridiculed the speech. Nor was it popular with Senate Republicans. It brought down upon my head political reprisal within the Senate. It even stirred up malicious attacks on my Americanism -- attacks which continued unabated through last year.

It would have been much more pleasant for me never to have uttered a word of the Declaration of Conscience. But I have never regretted in the slightest that I made it. I am not only glad -- but I am grateful to God that I did not choose to be a mental mute.

At the time that I made the Declaration, our country was in the initial stage of a national sickness of moral and mental paralysis in which increasing numbers of Americans were becoming mental mutes -- their voices stilled and their courage cropped. They didn't dare say what they thought. They were even getting so they didn't even dare think for fear their thoughts might be read.

The American code of "innocent until proved guilty" was rapidly being replaced with the Communist-Fascist reverse code of "guilty until proved innocent". It did not matter how difficult it was to prove innocence in an atmosphere of exploitation of doubt. Even the recourse of "sue me" advocated by the cynics with all of its inadequacies on salvaging a ruined reputation was not available against immunity-protected accusers.

And so this dread national sickness of creeping mental paralysis ultimately, to the delight of the Communists and Fascists here and in foreign countries, developed into a galloping psychosis of fear and blind emotion. I know because I heard good, strong and seemingly courageous men in the Senate privately admit that they dare not speak their minds publicly, that they dare not raise their voices lest they commit political suicide.

For political security they agonizingly accepted the role of mental mutes.

Freedom of speech was so abused by some that it was not exercised by others.

It couldn't happen here - but it was happening here. Totalitarianism was beginning to set in. The extremists of both the Left and the Right increasingly "bullied" their way around in their drive to silence their critics. To them a "middle ground" could not be tolerated. And so like the Communists of Russia and China and the Hitler Nazis of Germany and the Mussolini Fascists of Italy, they set out to destroy ruthlessly anyone who disagreed with them. They found the most effective manner of destruction was destruction of reputation.

And they had significant victories - sickening victories that swelled the ranks of the mental mutes. These victories caused them to be come heady and to throw their weight and power around with even greater recklessness. And in this process, they began to place self-confessed liars on pedestals to sit in judgment on the Americanism of some reputable leaders of our country.

True enough, they included communists and pro-communists in their attacks and accusations. But in their accusations and attacks they lumped the communists and pro-communists together with some leaders whose patriotism to this country is beyond question. And in doing so, they served the very cause of the communists and the fascists. Not only were they adopting totalitarian tactics of "confuse, divide and conquer" by this strategy, but they were making it all the more difficult to expose and root out the traitors.

Perhaps they rode their highest in 1953. Perhaps they reached their peak in that year. For there were pitifully few Americans who rejected the role of mental mutes to speak up. Thank God there were a few to speak up.

If 1953 was the peak year for the extremists of both Communist and Fascist characteristics, then surely 1954 was the climax of the unavoidable delirium that our country was going through before recovering from the national sickness of moral and mental paralysis.

For two very important things happened. First, the extremists of both the left and the right overextended themselves. The people began to get fed up and disgusted with them.

Second, to the surprise of the extremists, they were not able to kill off politically the rare few who continued to speak out against them. Instead, impressive demonstrations of support were made by the people for those rare few. And many of those who had temporarily accepted the role of mental mutes - who had tried to blind themselves as to what was going on - gained enough courage to join the small ranks of those who speak up. Once the trend started, the return road to reason and political courage became heavy with traffic.

And now in 1955 as you leave the cloistered halls of this great institution, there are clear signs that the national delirium is over and that we are well on the way to recovery from the national mental sickness of moral and mental paralysis.

There is some good that has come out of this sickness we have been through. It toughened us up to the threat of communism. It awakened us to the ways and tactics of the communists. But it also awakened us to the ways and tactics of the Fascist-minded.

More than that, it made us realize that as far as our liberties and our American way of life are concerned, there is no basic difference in the goals and the ways and tactics of the Communist and the Fascist. For both of them are totalitarians who seek to destroy our republic.

The totalitarians of both the extreme left and the extreme right have failed. For that we can be most grateful. But they came close to winning because too many people were afraid to speak up -- just as people in Hitler's Germany, Mussolini's Italy and Stalin's Russia did not speak up.

And the totalitarians will keep on trying. The only way that you and I -- and mostly you because you are the leaders of tomorrow -- can defeat the totalitarians from destroying our wonderful way of life is to remain not only vigilant but intelligently vocal.

Perhaps I have been too personal in my observations to you on this occasion. But when you speak from the heart it is difficult not to speak in personal terms. I am not important as a person to you. And surely my Declaration of Conscience is of no significance to you as a literary effort of mine.

The importance is in what the Declaration of Conscience symbolizes. That is why I would like to think that Temple University has conferred the honorary degree of Doctor of Literature on me because of the Declaration of Conscience. And if that should be the case, then I accept that degree not as personal recognition to me but rather as recognition to all of those who spoke up during these trying times - to all of those who refused the more secure role of mental mute.

In closing, I would like to repeat to you a statement I have made of what I believe --- and hope that you would share some of my beliefs as you go forward to make a place for yourselves under the sun.

Many nights I go home from the office of the Senate Floor tired and discouraged. There's lots of glory and prestige and limelight for a United States Senator that the public sees. But there's just as much grief and harassment and discouragement that the public doesn't see.

Of course, like everyone else I went into public service and politics with my eyes wide open. I knew that any public official is fair game for slander and smear and carping criticism. I knew that ingratitude was to be expected.

I knew that fair weather friends would turn on me when they felt I no longer served their purposes. I knew that I would be called all sorts of names from crook on down. I should have known that chances were good that I would even be accused of being a traitor to my country.

These things I knew. But I never knew how vicious they could get and how deeply they could cut.

It is these things I think of when I'm tired and discouraged -- and when I wonder if being a Senator is worth all that I put into it. These are the times when I consider quitting public life and retreating to the comforts and luxury of private life.

But these times have always been the very times when I became all the more convinced that all the sorrow, abuse, harassment and vilification was not too high a price or sacrifice to pay. For it is then that I ask myself "What am I doing this for?"

I realize that I am doing it because I believe in certain things -- things without which life wouldn't mean much to me.

This I do believe -- that life has a real purpose -- that God has assigned to each human being a role in life -- that each of us has a purposeful task -- that our individual roles are all different but that each of us has the same obligation to do the best we can.

I believe that every human being I come in contact with has a right to courtesy and consideration from me. I believe that I should not ask or expect from anyone else that which I am not willing to grant or do myself.

I believe that I should be able to take anything that I can give out. I believe that every living person has the right to criticize constructively, the right honestly to hold unpopular beliefs, the right to protest orderly, the right of independent thought.

I believe that no one has a right to own our souls except God.

I believe that freedom of speech should not be so abused by some that it is not exercised by others because of fear of smear. But I do believe that we should not permit tolerance to degenerate into indifference. I believe that people should never get so indifferent, cynical and sophisticated that they don't get shocked into action.

I believe that we should not forget how to disagree agreeably and how to criticize constructively. I believe with all my heart that we must not become a nation of mental mutes blindly following demagogues. I believe that we should never become mental mutes with our voices silenced because of fear of criticism of what we might say.

I believe that in our constant search for security we can never gain any peace of mind until we secure our own soul. And this I do believe above all, especially in my times of greater discouragement, that I MUST BELIEVE -- that I must believe in my fellow man -- that I must believe in myself -- that I must believe in God -- if life is to have any meaning.

Dear Ed:

I am writing to offer a contribution to your radio program and also to bring you up to date on my activities of the past few years. Since the war I have been active in both radio news and newspaper reporting here in the south. I also had a short stint teaching journalism at the University of Alabama.

As you know, the big story in the south for the past year has been the Supreme Court's decision on segregation. I have covered that story from several angles on the local, regional and national levels. And this brings me to a possible contribution to your radio program.

Ed, next Tuesday (May 17) marks the first anniversary of the Court decision. I'd like to suggest that you let me come up on your program, for 5 or 6 minutes, on the 17th., and discuss the progress that has been made; what has been done here in the south concerning segregation--in the past 12 months. It would be a sort of progress report; what changes, if any, have taken place, etc.

I have kept a pretty close tab on this story. I have a complete file on it. If you want this story, I can write the script, tape it, and air mail to CBS in plenty of time for your show of the 17th.

Enclosed are three scripts which deal with different aspects of the segregation story. I did these shows on the dates listed for NBC. As you can see, my handling of the story is down-the-middle. If I do this piece for you I'd handle it the same way. I can write and tape a good, tight script for you; a script that will touch the important points and not take over 5 or 6 minutes.

Here is a short outline of the major points which I would cover:

Present situation. The Court has recently concluded hearings and will soon hand down a decision naming the date that segregation will cease.

Evasive action. Southerners are not taking this decision without a fight. Right now the tactic is delay. But when a target date is given by the Court, then the real fight will start. It can mean bloodshed. Main weapon to be used against the Negro seems to be economic--cut him off from his job, credit, even food and shelter. Naturally, the Negro will fight back. The NAACP has become firmly entrenched down here and they will see to it that little ground (already won) is lost. Most tangible counter-measure, so far, to be used against the Negro is the organization of the White Citizen Councils. These councils are only the Ku Klux Klan called by another name. Whereas the Klan used physical violence as its main weapon, the Councils plan to use the weapon of economic strangulation. The CC started in Mississippi last summer and have since moved into all sections of that state, Alabama, Georgia and other southern states.

Unlike the Klan, the CC numbers among its members many of the most prominent men in a community. Leading CC member in Mississippi (and prime mover) is young Robert Patterson, former football star at Mississippi State, land-owner, from good family, respectable, etc. Leader of the CC is Alabama is State Senator Walter Givhan, wealthy land-owner and widely respected community figure. The CC meet in public halls, do not wear masks and sheets. Their technique is the quiet approach, letting the Negro know that they mean business but always with a certain dignity. So far the CC have stood as a threat more than anything else, although they have virtually stopped all Negro vote registration in Mississippi and also dealt severe financial blows to several once-prosperous Negroes.

Feeling down here is that the CC have the people behind them. Only a handful of the newspapers have denounced them. Among these: Hodding Carter's Delta Democrat Times, The Atlanta Constitution, The Montgomery Advertiser. Usually the Advertiser has very little in common with Carter and McGill, editor of the Constitution. But the present editor of the Advertiser is Grover Hall, Jr. His father won a Pulitzer Prize in the Thirties for fighting the Klan. Young Hall feels that he must take a similar stand.

On the other side. Schools for Negroes are being built all over the south as they have never been built before. There seems to be a feeling that if the wrongs of the past 50 years are set right--then the Supreme Court will go away and leave the south alone. Furthermore, many white and Negro children are now attending the same school in parts of the south. (see Church-Segregation script, enclosed) And in Texas this is true in non-Catholic schools.

Economically, the Negro in the south is better off (as a group) than ever before. In the larger cities they have their own radio stations (owned by white men) and more newspapers than ever before. And the white newspapers are devoting more and more space to Negro activities.

Lot and status of the Negro is definitely changing for the better. That's the main argument of the proponents of segregation. They say that given time the south will work out its problems with the Negro--but if the Supreme Court insists on pushing its decision down the throats of the south, then the economic reprisals are set in motion against the Negro and he loses all that he has gained. After all, they say, the white man still owns and runs practically everything in the south.

Odd angles: Willie Mays is by far the most famous (and respected) sports figures to come out of Birmingham. Yet, the Giants with Willie and other Negroes in the lineup cannot play in Birmingham. There's a city law against mixed teams playing in the city of Birmingham. Result: The Giants did not play Birmingham this year. And the people didn't like it.

Well, Ed, that's an outline of the story as I see it. I'd like to do this story for your show. If you can use it, send me a wire. I can have it up to you in plenty of time for next Tuesday's show. If you decide against the idea, keep the scripts and this outline. They may come in handy for background material for later broadcasts.

All of us who knew you, ever so slightly, during the war years are proud of your success. And the grace and dignity with which you wear it.

All the best.

Sincerely,

Starr Smith

Script on "The Church and Segregation" written and narrated by Starr Smith on National Broadcasting Company (WEEK END Program). March 27, 1955

(NBC Opening)

SMITH: When the Supreme Court, last May, handed down its decision on segregation in the public schools--it was generally understood that the ruling would strike deep into many phases of Southern life. At the time, and in the weeks that followed, very little was heard concerning the attitude of southern church leaders toward the historic decision. Now--both minister and layman in the South are beginning to give thought to the question: "What is the true attitude of the churches toward segregation of the races." Segregation, not only in the schools, but in the Church itself.

The highest Court in the land made the first great decision. Now it seems to be up to the churches to take a stand--in deed and spirit as well as intention and word.

Talking to people of several religious beliefs all over the South a reporter gains the impression that delay, planned delay, is the tactic of the foreseeable future. There also seems to be indecision and, in some quarters, conflict. The matter is not being ignored. It is probably the number one topic of discussion among Southern churchmen. And some action is being taken. But among the Protestant groups the action has not - so far - turned into a working plan of operation.

The largest single denominational group in the South are the Baptists. Last summer these Southern Baptists met in St. Louis, a meeting of the Southern Baptist Convention. The Convention made several recommendations concerning segregation. One of these stated, quote: "That the Convention recognizes the fact that the Supreme Court decision is in harmony with the constitutional guarantee of equal freedom to all citizens, and with the Christian principles of equal justice and love for all men." Unquote.

When this recommendation and others favorable to the Negro came up for a vote before the Baptist Convention, less than 200 voted against - out of a total attendance of 12 thousand. Yet the matter is not so simple as that. The Southern Baptist Convention is not the final governing body. The Convention can recommend, but it cannot enforce. Every Southern Baptist church is its own judge in such matters. But the Baptists have taken several liberal steps. At their seminaries, Negro theological students live the same life as the white students. There is no segregation.

To the Methodists of the South the segregation issue has brought conflict. Just a few days ago, 250 Methodist leaders from six southern states met in Birmingham, Alabama. These Methodist leaders pledged to fight the abolition of the Central Methodist Jurisdiction -- to which the Negro Methodist Churches belong. There has been some talk of doing away with the Central Jurisdiction. If this is done, then, presumably, white and Negro Methodists would attend the same church. Frankly, not many southerners believe this will happen. That is, not any time soon. Yet, the Methodist Social creed states: "We stand for equal rights and complete justice for all men in all stations of life." In spite of the words of the Methodist Creed, at least one Methodist minister has said: "If I let the color barriers down, my church would be destroyed. My deacons would not stand for it. My congregation would not stand for it. The church would be destroyed. It's as simple as that."

Like the Baptists and the Methodists, other Protestant churches in the south have resolutions and creeds which would tend to eliminate segregation of the races. But Creeds and Resolutions are ideals - theories - and there are times when a theory is one thing and a practical situation is quite another.

The Catholics are both cautious and progressive in their approach toward the segregation matter. Already several steps have been taken. The Reverend T. J. Toolen, Archbishop of Alabama, told me that Spring Hill College at Mobile has enrolled a number of Negro undergraduates, both men and women, without an unhappy incident. At Loyola University of the South in New Orleans, certain racial barriers have been lifted. Loyola is playing several basketball games this winter with schools which have Negro players on their teams. And at Loyola basketball games, Negro spectators are not segregated.

There has been much speculation concerning the mixing of white and Negro boys and girls on the grade school level. In some Catholic schools in the south this is now being done--and--apparently with success. A man with first-hand knowledge on this subject is Father Maurice Shean, General Chairman of the Catholic Committee of the South. The Committee which Father Shean heads reflects the thinking of the Catholic Bishops of the south. So -- for a special WEEK END report -- we go now to the Catholic Committee of the South at Rock Hill, South Carolina, and Father Maurice Shean.

FATHER SHEAN: Violence and disorder have been predicted for the south and yet from my own personal experience and from conversations with other priests I know that in those places where integration has been accomplished in the parochial schools there has been no violence and no disorder, specifically, in our own little school in Rock Hill which has been integrated. It's true that a couple of children were taken from the school but additional ones were enrolled so that actually the enrollment is larger than it would have been. I know, too, that integration in the parochial schools has been accomplished in Nashville, Tennessee; Richmond, Virginia; Arlington, Virginia; and Charlotte, North Carolina. When I say there has been no violence or disorder I'm not ignoring the fact that there has been some grumbling, but it seems to me that Americans have been grumbling about one thing or another for a long time and I rather gather that priests at one time or another grumble, too, about the things that they have to do. Nevertheless, if they do them in spite of the grumbling, that's all right. I think the thing will grow with quiet steps in the right direction but it's a combination of two efforts, to do what we have to do in our own schools and churches and to work with other people in the communities in which we live. When we do that, we need to remember the following things: First, that the essential effort of the Negro and other non-white races in the world is to achieve human dignity, and consequently we have wars, conflicts, communism and other forms of violent government. In our own country we are fortunate to have this drive channeled through the courts. In this particular instance, education. It might well be called a side-door entrance into the mansion of human dignity. Secondly, we need to remember that we in the South live in a bi-racial community and education therefore that is not bi-racial might very well be considered a lie. And the child that grows up without the opportunity of learning to live with, to share, and to study with members of other races, particularly when he is going to necessarily have to live with them as an adult is - strictly speaking - only half educated. Lastly, children can be counted on to act much more sensibly in this situation than adults, provided they are given an opportunity to associate with one another in a normal fashion. To be accepted in class with no reference to the fact that they are members of different races but that the situation is perfectly normal, which it should be. I would suggest that the words of another person might very well be to the point. They are these: "There is no legal way to do something which is illegal, just as there is no sinless way to commit sin."

We have instead the wealth of our faith in our democratic heritage in our own country to help us solve this problem as it ought to be solved.

SMITH: Most people in the south are attempting to meet the segregation question with dignity and humbleness and with a prayer in their hearts. But there are some who are using the Bible in an effort to justify segregation. One of the largest newspapers in the south recently carried a letter in its Letters-to-the-Editor section which said in part: "God himself believed in and practiced segregation. God placed the Negro in Africa, the white in Europe, the yellow in Asia and the red in America."

But that letter to the editor does not represent a majority opinion. This reporter has never talked to a Christian in the south who honestly believes that the Bible upholds segregation. Instead, the feeling might be summed up in this remark by a young Protestant minister, who told me: "The tragedy is deepened by the fact that the Church waited for the Court to be the Voice of Conscience."

(NBC OPENING)

SMITH: Today the South stands divided over the Supreme Court Decision. Feelings range from calm acceptance by some states to loud and angry threats by others. Three groups have now formed where once there seemed to be solidarity. The first group has apparently accepted the Court's ruling. West Virginia, Kentucky, Maryland, and possibly Oklahoma are planning to comply, and with little delay.

The second group is larger and much less compliant. These states -- Virginia, North Carolina, Tennessee, Alabama, Florida, Louisiana, Arkansas, and Texas -- apparently do not plan to comply until all legal loop-holes have been explored and exhausted.

The third or extremist group has been getting the headlines and probably will continue to do so. Here we find South Carolina, Georgia, and Mississippi. It is perhaps only coincidental that these states are led, in the old Southern manner, by fiery, militant, colorful governors: Jimmy Byrnes, in South Carolina -- Herman Talmadge in Georgia -- and Hugh White in Mississippi. It would be foolish to believe that these men do not represent the thinking of a majority of their people.

In measuring the depth of resentment felt by these three groups of Southern states, - a reporter must remind himself that the degree of protest against the Court Decision, voiced by a particular state seems to be in direct proportion to the size of that state's Negro population. Therefore, Kentucky with a Negro school child population of less than 7 percent plans to comply. On the other hand, Georgia's percentage is 48, and Governor Talmadge says his state will never comply.

Just as Ralph McGill and Hodding Carter, the South's most famous editors, speak for liberal Southerners, there is a spokesman for the conservative side. He is John Temple Graves, a Princeton graduate, whose widely-read column appears daily in more than a dozen Southern newspapers. Here are the views of Mr. Graves, given to me exclusively for Week End.

GRAVES: The South, I think, will be faithful to the decision in its fashion, and the Supreme Court's fashion.

Perfectly within the law, the Court has tortured the Constitution.

Perfectly within the law, the South will torture the Court's decision, taking advantage of every loop-hold, obstruction and obfuscation it can find.

If anybody cries shame, let him consider that the Court itself has taught us, that in recent years it has tortured the welfare clause in the Constitution, the commerce clause, the 10th Amendment, and the "segregation" of powers under the Constitution.

Until this drastic, impossible decision, our colored people have been advancing so fast politically and economically their problem has been to keep up with themselves. Millions of Southern whites have been glad, as Americans and Christians.

But these millions are certain there must continue to be segregation in public schools, as a police measure if nothing else.

They know the real sin isn't segregation but hate, injustice, underprivilege, and they are purging themselves of these faster than Chicago is, or Detroit, Los Angeles, Seattle and New York.

We like Negroes in the South.

That isn't the whole answer but it's the basis of whatever answer is ever going to be.

SMITH: John Temple Graves promises evasive measures, but he does not define them. This is perhaps because each state has its individual problems which it alone must work out. But the planning is going on. What will work for one state may not work for another. However, there is one counter-measure which is being very carefully studied by more than one state. This is the old political device of gerry-mandering -- re-zoning a community whereby, regardless of residence, Negroes and whites would go to separate schools. Many Southerners feel that gerry-mandering in one form or another offers the best "out" to the Court ruling -- although they admit it would take more than a genius to draw up the re-zoning plans. Here's what I mean: Take a Southern city of about 50 thousand people. The most exclusive white residential district is located on -- let us say -- X Street. One block away, on Y Street, is another high-class residential area. But running between the two streets is a narrow, twisting alley-way where half-a-hundred Negroes live.

How -- you may ask -- can this square block be re-zoned so that the Negro children from the alley would attend a colored school across town? That's a good question, and many a Southerner is puzzled over the answer. But in spite of the odds against it, many people think that gerrymandering may be an 'out".

Mrs. Ruby Hurley of Birmingham is Regional Secretary for the Southeast District of the National Aesociation for the Advancement of Colored People, motivating force behind the Court decision. Her area covers the extremist states of South Carolina, Georgia, and Mississippi. Taking into consideration the problems of counter-measures and evasive devices, Mrs. Hurley sees nothing to be really alarmed over. She told me:

HURLEY: Strong emotional ties to the past may make it difficult for many people in the South to adjust easily to the new idea of living without racial segregation. However, history shows that when man uses his head, he can live with many changes. We are fully cognizant of the resistance to the Supreme Court's decision affecting segregation in public education. Many efforts may be made to circumvent it. But they will be lost, the law is binding. The vast majority of us are law-abiding Americans who will adjust and go on living. I believe that many more people than we realize have already begun to adjust. Professional politicians are politically and economically selfish in their motives for denunciation of, and cries for circumvention of the Supreme Court ruling. They are loud because they are wrong. They may attempt to set up private schools, but if they use public money as members of the participating school boards, they will be called into court. They may attempt to gerrymander school districts, but HellBurn, N. Y., found that did not work ten years ago. They may create more problems with separate schools for boys and separate schools for girls. Whatever they attempt to evade the ruling will fail because right will prevail. We believe that millions of Americans, Negro and white in the South, will be coming together now to work in a common effort for the good of all our children and for our individual and collective well-being. Full freedom must maintain for every American, for, if I keep my brother in bondage, I am bound with him, and each of us wants to be free.

SMITH: There is still another counter-measure which is being discussed in the utmost privacy by some Southerners. It may be used by both the moderate and extreme states as a last resort. In its final phases, this plan may be termed the weapon of economic strangulation. A form of gerrymandering, this device, according to its sponsors, calls first for voluntary removal of all Negroes to one or several sections, depending on the size of the city. It would then be easy to re-zone the community so that school segregation could be maintained. If a Negro refuses to move voluntarily to the section set aside for him, then the economic strangulation takes over. Here's how that would work: Regardless of where Negroes now live in the South, their homes -- for the most part -- are owned by white people. The Negro refuses to comply willingly, so the white owner hands him an eviction notice. There is still another step to this plan. Its sponsors point out that since most Southern Negroes work for white bosses, dismissal can be used as a weapon. A Negro refuses to move into a section which can be easily re-zoned, so his boss fires him, and sees to it that he doesn't get another job unless he promises to comply.

So the struggle begins in the South, quietly now, but it may reach desperation stages before many months have passed. Few people doubt the final outcome. The NAACP has set September 1955, as the deadline for ending all public school segregation under the Court ruling. But most Southerners, even those of the most liberal persuasion, believe it will be much, much longer. (NBC CLOSE)

SEGREGATION SCRIPT BY STARR SMITH ON NATIONAL BROADCASTING COMPANY (WEEK-END PROGRAM) SUNDAY, APRIL 25, 1954, 4:30 P.M. (CST). WEEK-END PROGRAM RUNS FOR TWO HOURS, STARTING AT 3 P.M. (CST).
THIS SCRIPT RUNS FOR APPROXIMATELY 10 MINUTES.

SMITH: Since the turbulent days of Reconstruction, the South has handled school segregation and, in a larger sense, the entire Negro situation in its own way. According to most Southern thinking, segregation is a matter for each state to work out...a matter of States Rights. But the passing years have brought changes. The South of today is not the South of 20 years ago...or even 10 years ago. There have been signs, especially since the last war, that the theory of States Rights, with regard to the Negro, would have to be re-examined. Tangible evidence of this re-examination came when Court action was filed against five states to force those states to abolish segregation in public schools. This fight is being led by the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People. States involved in the Court action are: South Carolina, Virginia, Delaware, Kansas and the District of Columbia. The case is now in the hands of the Supreme Court. Decision is expected later this year.

While the Court decision, when it comes, will affect only the five states mentioned, the pattern will, nevertheless, have been established and in time all Southern states will have to abide by the ruling. This can take a long time, possibly years, if every case is fought through the lower courts until the Supreme Court hands down the final decision. But already hot Southern tempers are blazing at the very thought that school segregation will be abolished. Herman Talmadge, governor of Georgia, left little doubt when he said:
"Every arm of the militia will be used in Georgia to uphold segregation in spite of how the Court rules." Thurgood Marshall, the Negro lawyer who carried the segregation fight to the Supreme Court, says: "We will follow the line of complete cooperation, not upheaval."

SEGREGATION SCRIPT (2)

A few days ago...a campus newspaper reporter from one of the South's largest and oldest universities...went to Tuskegee Institute, the famous Negro college in Alabama. He talked to a cross-section of students at Tuskegee and asked their views on segregation. Cladious Walker, editor of the Tuskegee student newspaper voiced the opinion of his classmates when he said: "It is my honest belief that the hierachy of races and any evidence used to support it is un-Godly and unconstitutional. I feel confident that segregation is on the way out."

Altogether, 15 Tuskegee students talked to the white reporter and consented to be quoted by name. When the reporter returned to his own campus, he attempted to conduct a similar survey among his classmates. He found seven who would speak for quotation, but only if he agreed not to use names. Of the seven who spoke up, five felt that Negroes should not be allowed to attend that particular university. Two said it would be okay with them if Negroes studied there.

In private conversation, many top-level Southern educators will tell you that it's only a matter of time before Negro graduate students are on the campus of all state-supported universities in the South. Negro students are already attending the graduate schools of Texas, Oklahoma and LSU. One Southern college president, Dr. Ralph Draughon of Auburn has not hesitated to point out that, a few Negro graduate students on the large Auburn campus would bring no great change. Doctor Oliver Carmichael, president of the University of Alabama, has urged extreme caution in discussing the explosive segregation question. Doctor Carmichael told me: "Every responsible man and woman in the South is giving much thought to this matter of segregation. It is indeed a problem of great magnitude which touches not only the legal principles of our time but social and ethical principles as well. But nothing is to be gained by idle talk. I think until the Court decision is made, it will be best for us all to refrain from making predictions."

SEGREGATION SCRIPT (3)

While few Southerners will make predictions or even discuss the Court decision, there is, nevertheless, an air in the South this Spring of careful watching and waiting...of thinking and planning. Most of this planning revolves around the counter-measures which the states may take if the Court rules against segregation. The first of these counter-moves is delay...and more delay. Put off all action until it can be delayed no longer. Another counter-measure would be to expand the "separate-but-equal" school facilities concept. But this may be much too expensive for most Southern states. One state has estimated that it would have to spend 300 million dollars to equalize white and colored facilities.

Some states have looked into the possibility of setting up "private" schools as a counter-measure. These schools would be financed by state grants. This plan would turn over classrooms to local corporations which, in turn, would run them as "free private schools." South Carolina and Georgia have already set up plans for private schools in function if segregation is abolished. Still another counter-measure would involve gerry-mandering, or rezoning of school districts. This would be planned so that white children would go to one school and the Negroes to another. Since the Negroes usually live in one section of town and the whites in another, this might work in the cities...but it would probably not work so well in the country where no system of residential zoning could prevent the plantation owner's children...and the children of his tenant farmer from attending the same school.

Not long ago, the Lieutenant Governor of a Southern state pointed out to me an unusual aspect of this segregation issue. He mentioned that many Negro teachers in the South are not lining up four-square behind the non-segregation forces. This, he explained, was because these teachers know their jobs would be lost in the event of non-segregation. They know, he said, that the school boards, which employ teachers, would not hire a Negro teacher to instruct white students. Now, I'm sure that this high-ranking state official did not mean to imply that all Negro teachers in the South are against non-segregation; many of them are simply thinking of their own jobs.

As the quiet watching and waiting goes on this Spring...there are some sections of the South where non-segregation is in practice every day...and with apparent success On Southern military bases segregation no longer exists.

One of the most courageous and respected voices in the South belongs to Hodding Carter, editor of the Greenville, Mississippi, Times-Democrat. Mr. Carter, in 1946, received the Pulitzer prize for his editorials on racial intolerance. His calm and thoughtful viewpoint is liberal...but not extreme. Here, now, are the views of Hodding Carter as he gave them to me especially for this broadcast:

CARTER: It seems to me that we of the South are about to reach a most critical juncture in relations between the races during the present century. I speak of course of the Supreme Court's long awaited decision on segregated schools. Some of the more extreme spokesmen of both races, North and South, expect more for good or ill from the decision than will probably be the case, but, we can all be fairly certain of these results. One: The Court will not uphold the constitutionality of segregation. Two: Neither the Court's decision nor any compulsive efforts to enforce it can readily integrate the dual system in the South in the ascertainable future, neither next autumn, nor the next, nor the next, nor the next. Most children in the South will continue to go to racially distinct schools by reasons of residential patterns, because of local pressure, and most importantly, by choice. This matter of choice is the significant factor. For once a right to do something is established, choice and the consequences of that choice become paramount. Three: No matter what the Court's decision may be, the South will accelerate the improvement of its public school systems. It will not ...and cannot...destroy those systems by subterfuge. Four: As Americans, Southerners will accommodate themselves to the Court's decision although not willingly, not immediately, not completely, and not everywhere at once. And lastly, the parallel progress of the two races in the South will continue. Of that I am most certain of all. The record of development and orderly change backs me up.

SMITH: Naturally, Hodding Carter does not find complete agreement on those views throughout the South. There are men of honor...and high purpose...in all parts of the South who would beg to differ with Mr. Carter. And they do so as only a Southerner can...passionately...and sometimes...forcefully. But Hodding Carter's claim of development and orderly change in the South...finds support in the following facts:

There are several hundred Negro policemen now walking beats in Southern cities... including Memphis and Atlanta.

A Negro lawyer, Arthur Shores of Birmingham, is running for the state Legislature, the first of his race to run for that office in Alabama since Reconstruction days.

In conservative Mississippi...Negroes are now serving on Grand Juries...and all over the South they are going to the polls in ever increasing numbers. At least 75 thousand Negroes are expected to vote in Alabama this year.

A radio station owned by the Birmingham News has a regular quiz program which features Negro high school students. Ray Furr, director of the program, says the listening audience is large and results are fine.

In Atlanta, Manager Whitlow Wyatt, of the Atlanta Crackers has said that Nat Peeples looks like a pretty good bet to become the first Negro to play baseball in the Southern Association.

And in his office at the Atlanta Constitution, famed editor Ralph McGill, says: "Segregation is on its way out, and he who tries to tell the people otherwise does them a great disservice. The problem of the future is how to live with the change."

This is Starr Smith.

My dear Ed,

It is impossible for me to express in words my sincere thanks for returning to me the D-Day announcement with the most important signature on it. I fully realise that there is no one else who could have got this other than yourself, and I hope that if the opportunity should arise you will convey to the President my most sincere thanks for his kindly gesture, not only for the signature, but for the words which he added to it. It will remain my personal pride and treasured possession and that of the generations to come. And when the time comes for me to express my great appreciation for your efforts in a more concrete form - when we meet personally - I shall be more than delighted to do so.

At least I am more in touch with you than you are with me, for I do see you from time to time on our Television Service, and enjoy every moment of your personal appearance and the words of wisdom.

Dear Jim:

This is the first, and I assure you the last time I will ever initiate anything of this sort. The attached card was sent to me by one, John Snagge, one of the steadiest and best of BBC reporters. His was the first voice who announced the Allied landings on D-Day. He was around SHAEF a great deal and the President might remember him. At any rate, John asked me if I thought there was any possibility of getting the President to sign or initial the card. What do you think?

My dear Ed,

Many thanks for your letter of the 6th December. I am enclosing the pink card from SHAEF. It is not an impressive document I know - but I can only claim that it is the original, and that so many important documents never look quite dressed up for the part. You may remember that though it was at one time projected that two voices should make the "A" and "B" announcements, it finally came down to the one voice - my own - at least so far as all the BBC Services - Home, Forces, Overseas and European - were concerned.

It is most kind of you to see what you can do about the President's signature, and if you are successful I can only await your return to England with anxiety, and a great deal of impatience and expectation, in order to make some small attempt to repay some of your great kindness.

With all good wishes, to you and yours,
Yours sincerely,

(John Snagge)

P.S. Perhaps I should have explained that this actual pink card was preceded with the announcement:-
"This is London. London calling in the Home, Overseas, and European Services of the BBC and through United Nations Radio Mediterranean and this is John Snagge speaking. If you should decide to gather such a collection, please don't forget to consider Mr. Churchill's speech in the House of Commons upon the arrival in England of Queen Elizabeth immediately after her father's death. It contained a reference to his pleasure at the recurrence of the slogan "God Save the Queen", which had been the watchword in his youth (or something to that general effect).

Dear Ed,

We have a very remarkable young man in Talks Department who is at present on a Commonwealth Fellowship in the States, attempting to study the impact of Radio and TV on American politics - political education and what not.

I've ventured to give him a note to send to you when he is in New York, and I'm writing now to beg you to spare him some time if he presents it.

He is a very unusual kind of chap - a working class lad, who got himself elected to his local Town Council in Lancashire at a very young age, and won scholarships first at Ruskin and then Cambridge, ending up as President of the Union at the latter, and a member of an inter-University debating team which toured the U.S.A. and Canada some years back. He'll go far, I think, if as he hopes he gets into Parliament later on. He has both brains and integrity, and "character" with nobs on. It should be a source of great satisfaction to you to know that you have opened the door to a creative future for a young person of outstanding ability who, without your generosity, would never have obtained an education.

We are hoping that you will renew this opportunity for your scholarship winner during the academic year 1955-56. As you know, Roosevelt has many more scholarship applicants than can be accommodated by available funds. It would be most unfortunate if there were any shrinkage in the opportunities for talented young people of every race, color, or creed to obtain an excellent education at Roosevelt University.

May I express the appreciation of our entire faculty for the splendid contribution you are making to higher education at Roosevelt.

Dear Mr. Murrow,

For some time now my husband and I, who are 1953 and 1954 college graduates, have admired, but more important, have respected your position, opinions and integrity. You have gained as close to the position of an authority in our household as anyone could.

We felt your stand during the McCarthy problem was especially outstanding and admirable. And I have learned to depend on your news analyses to help me in my understanding of our world relations and problems.

At present my husband is serving in Korea, but he will be home and discharged from the Army in June of this year. His present plans are to go ahead for his Master's Degree in Political Science next fall.

He has often mentioned his "dream" -- being a member of the Edward R. Murrow staff.

I realize you are an extremely busy person, but if possible I would appreciate your sharing with us the way in which you prepared yourself for your present position; and perhaps you could recommend a course of study--especially good schools in the fields you might recommend--which my husband could attend.

If you are unable to do this, I shall certainly understand.

Dear Ed,

Radio commentators still get their measure of mail. By the same token, we still feel ourselves beholden to the listener-writers, with the result that a reasonable portion of our work-a-day schedule finds us occupied with the rather important matter of giving adequate reply to the letters.

But, no matter how moment-crammed the schedule, I've got to take time out and send this along. I'd be remiss in my deep appreciation of a truly great piece of work, if I didn't write you. After reading this "salute" I'd imagine you'd want to relay it to Mrs. Theodore Roosevelt, Jr. I'm sure she would like to learn how some of us (alleged professionals) feel about the highly professional job this lovely lady turned in last night.

She imparted an emotionally beautiful impact, from the salutation to the sign-off. The "Person to Person" interlude was person-to-person in more ways than the attention-catching title of a TV show. For all the tragedies she suffered, Mrs. Roosevelt measures up to a self-effacing heroic figure that's an inspiration to mankind. In that one appearance alone, she has achieved enviable stature. So can be the glory and power of a TV interview well done.

If ever there will be something like a Pulitzer Prize or a TV Oscar for brilliance of achievement in the short period of 18-minutes (more or less doesn't matter) Mrs. Roosevelt would run off with the accolade without any competition. The lady of inspiring Rooseveltian heritage and tradition was just simply marvelous.

What made it so, was her sincerity of manner; her simplicity of style; her profoundly felt feel for the things she said. She talked of things so near to the heart of people everywhere. She dealt with the big,humanitarian issues confronting a confused, bollixed-up old world. What she said, will make its impact on the minds of people. It will serve as an enduring contribution to man's struggle toward a better way of life, and a happier approach toward those challenging,unborn tomorrows.

All this, mind you, from a reporter who himself has been person-to-personing (interviewing people) --befpre the mikes--for 21 years. I well remember on several occasions having had the late Theodore Roosevelt,Jr., as an interviewee...Congratulations Ed,on one of the outstanding interludes in the history of your program.

Sincerely,

It seems a shame to have your tremendous drive, earnestness, honesty and ability go down the path to ultimate obscurity without leaving a lasting contribution to the very vast mass of people you are trying to serve!

I'm sure you stop stock-still, every once in a while, and wonder not only where it all leads to — but how terrifyingly fragile and short-lived all your building becomes once you are no more.

Long before I knew of you, a solution to all this — a method of delivering truthful news direct to the mass population in such a startling and strong manner that it would become a permanent institution — has been denied voice due to the lack of proper sponsorship.

It would take great courage, ingenuity and effort — but the reward would be tremendous — and would set a pattern of public thought long after you.

You seem to be such a man.

For myself, this is simply part of a personal creed to supplement professional life with some contribution to society.

Mr. Edward R. Murrow
Pawling, New York

Dear Mr. Murrow:

Six years ago, as a college student in Connecticut, I initiated and organized an Inter-collegiate Student Legislature which was participated in by all the colleges and universities in the State of Connecticut. This project consisted of a three day laboratory practice, in government, at the state capitol in Hartford, which was concerned with learning legislative procedure and writing legislation. The students prepared bills ahead of time which were brought to this student legislature. These bills were discussed in committees patterned on those of the regular legislature and then considered in both the student house and senate which were also patterned on the regular legislature. The students learned to appreciate not only the processes involved in legislation but the give and take of political maneuvering.

I believe that such a program as the one active in Connecticut (it has continued to be an annual event ever since its beginning six years ago) might prove extremely successful and important if expanded to a national laboratory in government for colleges and universities all over the country. Such a laboratory held in Washington D. C. would, it seems to me, act as an incentive for students throughout the country to acquire an appreciation for our democratic processes and to participate, politically, in their future communities.

I have in mind a plan which I believe could effectively bring about such a national student laboratory in government. The amount of money needed to initiate such a plan would not be great. One of the many foundations throughtout the country, I believe, might well sponsor the prodedure. However, I am limited in my knowledge of their procedures and personnel. Also, an unknown person finds it difficult to arrange an audience. I am writing to you because of your early interest in educational projects(in the field of international education, I believe) and as a person who would know of the opportunities available for my idea. I realize how extraordinarily busy you must be, but if you thought the idea an important one, I would greatly appreciate any help you might afford. I would, at any time, be happy to meet with you in order to further illuminate my plan.

At present, I am thirty-one years of age and a teacher in the public schools of Westport, Connecticut. I have been suggesting a national student legislature to many involved in our Connecticut one. Although everyone agrees that the idea is sound, there has been no one who has been able to contact the right source.

Sincerely,

Edwin D. Stevens

Dear Messers Granger and Murrow:

It has been brought to my attention that you two in the "Person to Person" TV program of October 7, made some very important comments concerning the need for raising teachers' salaries in our country. The teachers in North Carolina feel that you stated a most important fact when you emphasized that parents who turned their children over to teachers should realize the importance of that person to whom their children are entrusted for training.

I sincerely believe that the voices of people like you have a large influence and responsibility in the molding of public opinion concerning the problems involved in public education at this time. Nearly everyone who thinks seriously about public education agrees that the matter of teachers' salaries is the chief impediment in the selection and holding of qualified persons in the profession.

Very sincerely,

Dear Frank:

Please forgive the delay in answering your letter of April 8th. My crowded radio and television schedule leaves me all too little time in which to take care of my mail.

I shall be glad to see Mr. Arundel, but since he lives in Washington, I don't know quite what to suggest. If you are in touch with him and find that he is going to be in New York sometime, perhaps you will let me know so that we can arrange a meeting.

Sincerely yours,

Dear Ed:

I am enclosing a letter which is self-explanatory. I called you when I was up in the country last weekend but was unable to reach you. I am taking the liberty of indenting on our friendship and am sending this letter directly to your office.

Admiral Phillips is a personal friend of mine and I operated upon his wife. They are a delightful family and I think they are just trying to do a good turn for the Arundel boy. If you wish I will be glad to contact the boy or you can write him directly. Whatever you wish. He sounds like a boy who wants to follow in your footsteps, if possible, and has a case of hero-worship. I personally feel that boys like that should be encouraged. This time I think the boy has made a good choice and because of that I would like to see him helped.

I hope we get a chance to see each other up in the country very soon.

Many thanks for anything you can do, Ed.

Very sincerely,

Frank

Dear Frank

This is a letter to ask a favor, so you may put it aside till you have time - Grace & I have a young friend, Nicky Arundel, the son of close pals of our own age - He very much wants to meet Edw. R. Murrow & interview him on job possibilities - If you could ask Murrow to see the boy & give him a few minutes, we'd be very grateful - In particular if it could be done out in the country I believe it would be better. But that's up to you -

The boy's address is:

Arthur Arundel
c/o Russell M Arundel
World Center Bldg, 16th & K Sts NW, DC 6.

Here is his background: son of the MFH of the Warrenton Hunt. Raised in Virginia on a horse - Harvard '52 cum laude - Marine Corps reserve lieutenant. Served 2 yrs. with Marines in Korea & Indo China, including the evacuation from N. Indo China - Released from Marines, has just returned from a 3-month safari in Africa an brought back 2 young gorillas, 1 male 1 female, for the Washington Zoo which are unique in Zoo History - Now wishes (age about 25) to get established in something that would further the cause of the U.S.A. Is great admirer of Bourrow & would like to work for him in any capacity - Is physically & mentally tough, but a genuine idealist and has unusually attractive personality - Extremely well-to-do financially so salary no object -

You take it from there, pal -

News from the home front: my old lady is so full of beans, driving so many golf & tennis balls & running so many civic activities that I think soon you'll have to remove a few glands - I know where she gets it from: Mrs Hendrick at 92 went to Miami this winter in a wheel chair, had sun & sea bathing & has now returned kicking up like a Rockette - We are off April 25 for Greece, having hired a sail boat to cruise the Aegean Islands. Shall be in N.Y.C. a day or so beforehand & hope to see you then, but hope even more that you & your missus will come to DC in mid to see the flowers - there are the rooms on 3rd floor always ready for you. Cheers

Neil

Dear Mr. Stiver:

Very many thanks for your letter.

I appreciate your suggestion that the talk between Ed Sullivan and myself on the meaning of freedom should be published in a form that could be distributed to people in other countries. However, I am not at all sure that it is up to either one of us to suggest it to the State Department.

Many thanks for taking the trouble to write to me and for passing your idea along to friends who might be able to take some action.

Sincerely yours,

Mr. Edward R. Murrow,
c/o Columbia Broadcasting System Inc.,

Dear Mr. Murrow:

I have been thinking about the piece you did a week ago Sunday night with Ed Sullivan, and still feel that it was one of the best explanations of Democracy and the meaning of Freedom that I have ever seen or heard. The story about your father, the two about President Eisenhower and what the British Parliament were debating when the country was about to be invaded, all said to me complete honesty of purpose, and that to me is the most important part of what democracy is. It is also the reason why it works.

It could be that because I spent four years with the O.W.I. during the last war trying to help make people in other countries understand how our democracy works, that I'm overly concerned about the job and the importance of our doing it really well and fairly fast.

Also two years ago I married a girl that was born in Germany and had lived in Buenos Aires from 1927 until we left there in May 1953. Two weeks ago she appeared in the Federal Court in South Bend, Indiana and became an American citizen, and I am sure she doesn't yet fully understand our democracy. Unfortunately, she didn't see your TV show with Sullivan. I'm also sure that the years I spent in Argentina from 1945 until 1953 helped make me more sensitive about the importance of freedom to all the people in the world everywhere.

I believe that recordings and films of the show, or even a simple little pamphlet with the exact words you and Ed spoke printed in it, would do a great deal to help if they were passed out to people in other countries.

Our State Department has the machinery to do this kind of thing and the tax payers are willing to cover the expense.

That's why Peron + Evita were licked at the start.

Mr. Edward R. Murrow.

If you think my idea is of any value, I'm sure that between you and Ed you must know someone in Washington who might do something about it.

I am also passing the idea on to some of my friends who could help, and maybe between us all we can get the News and Information section of the State Department interested.

I hope to have the pleasure of meeting you some day.

Yours sincerely,

Michael L. Stiver

KENT SCHOOL

FIFTIETH YEAR CELEBRATION

SEMINAR

THE CHRISTIAN IDEA OF EDUCATION

KENT, CONNECTICUT

NOVEMBER 25-29, 1955

WELCOME

Kent School extends a cordial welcome to all of the members of the Seminar on The Christian Idea of Education.

The School is celebrating its fiftieth anniversary, and believes that the Seminar will be the most important academic event of that year-long celebration. It is our hope that this meeting may be a means of regaining and restating something of the vision of what general education could be within a Christ-centered culture.

We are deeply grateful to the leaders, the group chairmen, and all others whose work has made this Seminar possible.

JOHN O. PATTERSON
Rector and Headmaster

THE PURPOSE AND PLAN OF THE SEMINAR

The purpose of this Seminar is to examine and identify in a fundamental fashion the peculiar characteristics of the educational processes and objectives which constitute The Christian Idea of Education. The emphasis will not be on religious perspectives in teaching nor on the problems of the Christian teacher, but will rather be concerned with education in its entirety from a Christian viewpoint.

The plan is a simple one. The eight Seminar leaders will each present one aspect of the subject. These addresses will be given each morning and each evening in the auditorium. Each afternoon, members will attend the meeting of the discussion group of which they are a part. After the concluding meeting of each group, its chairman will be asked to formulate the group's statement of The Christian Idea of Education.

The detailed program and other information concerning the Seminar will be found in this booklet.

Dear Ed:

I intended to mention to you during our very pleasant cocktail hour last night one of the more remote consequences of See It Now.

Your South African pieces earlier this year so impressed the student listeners at Kent School -- who are permitted to sit up and watch certain SINs -- that the student body voted to send its entire Chapel collections for the year to the Anglican monk who appeared on the program, Father Huddleston.

The School newspaper has now received a letter to the editor from Alan Paton, and a most excellent letter it is. As one more example of what endless chains of events can be set in motion by a program such as yours, I thought you might be interested in glancing at Paton's letter. Accordingly, you will find it attached.

Yours,

Lou

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

Natal,
South Africa.
18 May, 1955

Dear Boys,

It was a great joy to me to learn that the School Chapel offerings for a very generous period of time are to be sent to the Community of the Resurrection in South Africa. You could not be giving to any better cause. The Community of the Resurrection has, from the beginning of its work in South Africa, laboured faithfully and courageously in the cause of the African people. Fr. Trevor Huddleston is a champion of all those who are deprived and oppressed. He is not a popular man in South Africa, because the truth that he speaks is not always pleasant to our ears, but I have no doubt that what he speaks is nearer to being the truth of God than anything else that you will hear. He has a respect for truth and a hatred for injustice, and to thousands of African people he is the symbol of what is good.

South Africa is a country where race has become an obsession, where Christian morality has given way to race morality, and where the whole machinery of government is occupied with one supreme task, and that is to keep all the races separate from one another, under white domination. No community has spoken out more courageously against this than the Community of the Resurrection to which you are giving your offerings.

Do not think of us as far away from you. We are much nearer than you think. What you do for us here, you are doing for your own country by helping the cause of justice in another part of the world, which means you will defend it more courageously at home. You cannot defend a piece of freedom, a piece of democracy, you must defend it all. Surely that is the lesson that the harsh events of this century have tried to teach us. Perhaps you do not know what encouragement will be given by your offerings to Fr. Huddleston and the Community of the Resurrection. They will be encouraged by your help, strengthened to continue, and reminded that they are not alone in the world.

Yours sincerely,
Alan Paton

Dear Ed --

That was a hell of a speech.

Did go further.

It was a fine speech.

Two listeners have since "sweetened the kitty" for Pater.

Yrs. Lou

It is not my prerogative to say thanks, but on Pater's behalf let me slip out of time and say it.

Dear Lee:

This is just a note to acknowledge yours of March 2nd.

Sunrise Point Cottage sounds more than delightful and if I find anyone suitable who is looking for a summer place to rent I will certainly let you know. I wish I could take it myself.

Sincerely,

Mr. Leland Stowe

Dear Ed: Just in case you might know someone who'd be interested in the attached, and would make congenial summer neighbors for us.

I know you've got an estate, and love it as we do our corner on the Lake — but you might know someone who hasn't got an estate!

Anyway I do trust your judgement implicitly —

Cheers, and with gusto

SHOPPING: 7 miles by car to Meredith or 13 to Laconia; 3 miles to country store in Meredith Center.

*** *** ***

RENTAL TERMS: According to number of proposed occupants.

Sunrise Point Cottage owes its exceptional attractions --both inside and outdoors--to very considerable expenditures for its modernization and furnishings; and to the owners' personal labors in enhancing its natural beauties. Because Sunrise Point is their summer home the owners desire to share its pleasures only with those who will fully appreciate and respect its charms; whose presence as neighbors they may also enjoy.

GERMANY TODAY, I

This is a report on Germany today — Germany reborn, Germany growing in industrial might, Germany rearming. It is based on a lifetime of intimate knowledge of Germany and the German people as well as repeated visits in recent years.

To anyone returning to Germany after seeing it last in 1947, the impact of what has been achieved is terrific. The rebuilding that has been done; the rebuilding that is going on today; the hectic pace of business and traffic; the artistic achievements, especially in the world of opera and theatre; the well-dressed throngs of people on the streets; the roadways crowded with shiny new automobiles; the trucks laden with building and construction materials that thunder through the streets of Munich, Augsburg, Frankfort, and other cities — all of this strikes the visitor as something unmatched not only in the other cities of Europe but, probably, unmatched in the world.

As Roscoe Drummond, one of our leading newspapermen, has described it, "... one of the most visible and impressive facts in all West Germany is this nation's thriving, throbbing, still expanding, full employment prosperity. You almost have to see it to believe it.... You see it in the humming, smoking, rebuilt factories of the Ruhr.

"You see it in the vast expanse of new housing which is going up in every city so fast that a new house or a repaired house is springing into view every eighty seconds -- 2,762,000 new dwellings in the last six and a half years.

"You can see it any Saturday or Sunday afternoon when tens of thousands of German families, most of whom did not own automobiles before the war, are already making the massive network of Hitler-built autobahns grievously inadequate as they take their weekly treks to the mountains and lakes."

What is the more remarkable is that the long working hours and the driving pace do not seem to weigh heavily on the population. Cordiality, smiles, and beaming good-will greet one on every side.

Yes, Germany is being rebuilt -- her industries, her arts, her sciences, her banking system, her production facilities of all kinds. Of course, American money, poured into Germany through our various foreign aid programs, has paid for much of the rebuilding. Yet the manifest energy, imagination, and courage of the German people must evoke the admiration of any man convinced that our private enterprise capitalistic system, whatever its faults, is the best the world has produced to date and that Germany's achievements are renewed evidence of its vitality.

That is one side of the picture -- reassuring, heartening, commanding our admiration.

Is there another side? Indeed there is, and too few people in our country are aware of it.

The generally accepted view seems to be that the Nazis have disappeared from the scene, in government and in business, and that those at the top who control industry and banking, manufacturing and production, are new men who never were active in the Nazi criminal conspiracy. The generally accepted view is that the business leaders of Germany today are democrats, not only in their speeches, but in their hearts, real democrats, not only so proclaimed by words in the present but so proclaimed by deeds in the past.

Regrettably, this belief is false. This picture of Germany as a nation in which the Nazi leadership and those who actively led the Nazi cause have disappeared from power is a completely untrue picture.

The youth of Germany are being filled with stories about the glorious march of German arms across the continent of Europe. All Germany now feels that if Hitler had only let the army alone, the world would have been theirs. The atrocities, murders, mass executions, razing of towns and villages have been forgotten.

Indeed, the leaders of the new, reborn Germany are recruited from the ranks of those who were the leaders of the Nazis when Hitler was in power.

It is my purpose in these editorials to document that statement, to tell the facts and name names.

Let us start off with some of the minor figures. Newspapers recently reported that Dr. Karl Clauberg and Colonel General Sepp Dietrich have been released from prison. We are informed, via the Associated Press, that their release was "in keeping with the present American-British-French policy of emptying war crimes prisons of Germans as soon as possible."

Who are these two men who have been liberated from war crimes prisons? Well, Dr. Clauberg was, during the war, head of what was termed the "experimental medical center" of the infamous Nazi extermination and concentration camp at Auschwitz. There and elsewhere under the direction of Dr. Clauberg and his associates, more than 5 million innocent people were done to death.

One of Professor Clauberg's so-called "scientific research projects" was to subject helpless women to experiments whose alleged object was to find a cheap, rapid, effective method of sterilizing them. His co-workers performed other similar "scientific research projects," such as smearing "test persons" — this was the Nazi term — with mustard gas to watch them die in agony. There were experiments with other human beings to see if the torture of death by thirst was greater if the individual were given no water or given only sea water to drink. These so-called "scientific research projects" included cutting off the limbs of young women for use in experiments with live tissue.

All of this, in case you are interested further, is told in detail in a book compiled from official records and bearing the endorsement of Brigadier General Telford Taylor, Chief of Counsel for War Crimes, and Dr. Andrew C. Ivy, Scientific Consultant to the Military Tribunal. The book is entitled "Doctors of Infamy, the Story of the Nazi Medical Crimes," and is published by Henry Schuman, New York.

The Russians captured Professor Clauberg and kept him prisoner until the middle of last month. On his return to West Germany, he was interviewed by German reporters and was coldly indifferent and quite unrepentant for the unmentionable tortures he had inflicted.

And who was Colonel General Sepp Dietrich, recently released from prison in keeping with the American-British-French policy of emptying the war crimes prisons? Dietrich, now 63, was a fanatical Nazi who rose to command Hitler's Elite Guard and was showered by Hitler with decorations. Known as the "Butcher of Kharkov" he was responsible for the notorious "Malmedy Massacre" of American prisoners. Colonel General Dietrich ordered that 150 disarmed, helpless American boys, prisoners captured during the Battle of the Bulge at Malmedy should be mowed down by machine gun fire. For this crime, he was sentenced to life imprisonment by an Allied war crimes tribunal. Nevertheless, on October 22 of this year he was set free. Thus he served a prison sentence of something like three weeks for each GI he murdered.

Only last Sunday we were told that the West German army had been reborn and, according to a dispatch from Bonn — I quote from The New York Times — "For the ceremony ... the Defense Minister stood under a huge reproduction of the Iron Cross. This Prussian emblem has been a German military decoration since 1813."

Thus the cases of Dr. Clauberg and Colonel General Dietrich assume a more sinister aspect, if we understand the release of these men as part and parcel of a policy of freeing war criminals, re-establishing an army with the old Prussian symbols, and, as I will tell you next week, helping the former leaders of the Nazi movement to become the dominant figures in the German industrial world, in business, in banking, in manufacture, and in production.

The admitted murderers and sadists, Clauberg and Dietrich, will not find themselves amid unfamiliar faces or in an unfriendly atmosphere when they mingle with the leaders of German industry, business, and banking today.

I will have that story next week.

Many, many thanks for the lunch today. I really enjoyed an opportunity for an all-too-brief chat with you. The next time must be at our home at Quarry Lake.

Thought you might be interested in glancing over the enclosed, although I send it with some diffidence as the subject is one about which you know so much more than I do.

Dear Mr. Murrow:

I have seen Leon Goldstein's letter to you of May 20 and your reply of June 3.

May I thank you very cordially for this reply. I have such respect for your judgment and your stature in the field of broadcasting that I am encouraged when you say that you are "entirely persuaded that there does not exist, despite the FCC language, any legal brief against the radio or television station adopting and practicing any overt editorial stand."

As you will see from the enclosed copy of a letter recently mailed, I am following the matter up. It seems to me that the more discussion, the better for all of us who believe that an informed public opinion is the very basis of democracy and that, therefore, any attempt to hedge with restrictions the right of free editorial expression on the air is unwise.

Parenthetically, you have two regular viewers in the person of Mrs. Straus, who is in charge of educational and children's programs on the station, and

Yours very cordially,

To the N.Y. Herald Tribune:

An article that appeared recently in the Herald Tribune by Nyles N. Peebles points out that radio and TV stations shy away from editorials despite President Eisenhower's suggestion that the industry should undertake the responsibility of airing editorial opinion, just as newspapers do. Said Mr. Peebles, "Where controversy is concerned, radio and television stations have chosen the position of the commentator who bravely speaks out against man-eating sharks."

Lest your readers assume that the above statements refer to all radio and television stations, let me assure them that such is not the case. As far back as 1947 many broadcasters complained to the FCC that the rule prohibiting a station from airing its views imposed an unfair and unreasonable restriction on American free radio. This stalwart stand by some broadcasters — even though only a handful — finally resulted in a reversal of the position of the Federal Communications Commission on editorializing by radio stations.

It is also a matter of record that some stations have taken forthright editorial positions on controversial issues. During the past year, I have spoken out emphatically on WMCA on such controversial issues as wire tapping, the rearming of Germany, the Federal loyalty-security program, foreign aid, the censure of McCarthy, the McCarran-Walter Immigration Act, etc. My series of editorials presented over WMCA each Friday evening from November 19, 1954 to April 8, 1955, constituted, I believe, the first regular schedule of editorial broadcasts in the history of radio. Opposing points of view were, of course, presented. It is my intention to resume this series on WMCA this Fall.

The right of radio and TV stations to express editorial opinion is basic in the maintenance of free television and free radio, just as the right to criticize is a basic requirement of a free press. May I, for that reason, commend the Herald Tribune coverage of the question and May I express the hope that the important subject will be dealt with further in your columns.

Faithfully yours,

It's a good many years since you and I have seen each other but I would very much appreciate half an hour of your time in the next couple of weeks if you could spare it.

Through a chain of circumstances I have gotten involved in the documentary film business and I would like to get some advice. I wonder if you could give me a ring at Plaza 5-2940 and let me know when I could see you.

Dear Mr. Stuart:

Thank you for your letter of November 30th.

I have scrutinized such references as I have made to Vice-President Nixon during recent months, and cannot in all honesty find any language which attempts to "pin back his ears".

As you say, the tone of the voice may convey a special meaning, but I honestly cannot find anything indicating what you call "hostility to the man". Aside from one passage in a broadcast made two days after the President became ill, in which I indicated that the Vice-President seemed unduly eager to assume responsibilities. In another broadcast two days later, I took pains to correct this impression, one which was, incidentally, shared by a considerable number of other reporters.

I am afraid that unless you can be a little more specific, I, in turn, cannot answer the rather broad charges you make.

Incidentally, I did one hour-long television program on the Vice-Presidency as an institution, in which the President's faith in the Vice-President was fully reflected and reported.

Thank you for your thoughtful letter, and if you have specific comments in the future on this subject, I hope you will let me know. They will receive my immediate attention.

Dear Ed Murrow:

For many years I have enjoyed your News Broadcasts. For the most part they appear to be factual and impersonal....calling the shots as you see them. But let me ask you a fair question: Why does an intelligent man like you permit yourself the unsportsmanlike and distasteful habit of "pinning back the ears" of Richard Nixon, Vice-President of these United States?

I expect you to deny this allegation. But the tone of your voice....the "slant" of your phrases and the in-between-words which are not uttered, all these unmistakably indicate your hostility to the man.

Why?

And in your position of great advantage over whomever might be your "pet" antagonist, you also bear a great responsibility to your listeners. You must give them statements unbiased...untainted by mere personal prejudices. If you do not do just that, then you have adulterated your vocation and you have allowed your intolerances to change your "news" broadcasts to a series of propaganda splurges.

You know we American people NEED the truth, and you know we can "take it". In these days when alert citizens feel we must face our common enemy, Communism, with bi-partisan solidarity, should you not, as one of our respected "vocals" take prayerful care of what you say and how you say it? And is this not more needful when it concerns a man whom our beloved President has great faith in? I am an "independent" voter. Would you take the time to mail me a considered reply? Thank you.

Sincerely,

Dear Ed:

As the anniversary of the Battle of the Bulge approached, I was moved to try to put the subject in verse form. Here is the way it came out in The Christian Science Monitor.

Since you were roaming about Europe in 1944, I thought you would be interested in seeing this. You may even detect a faint echo in one or two lines of your admirable prose in the record "I Can Hear It Now." I hope I have not digressed too far from historical accuracy.

I thought your recent show featuring Oppenheimer was one of the finest things I have been able to watch on TV.

With best regards to you,

"This Was the Drear December . . ."

This is the story of the Battle of the Bulge.

Analogies come tumbling over each other: An advance is as good as its ability to stand up against counterattack. . . . The last throes of an enemy system should not cause dismay, they are the signs of victory. . . . Progress is secure when resistance to it is overcome. . . . When a good cause meets a final test, it is necessary to reverse the reversal.

The accompanying prose-poem is a kind of allegory on these points. Often in the history of human thought a military event has served such a loftier purpose. Mr. Stringer was at Allied Headquarters. Today, 10 years after the battle (mid-December, 1944, to February, 1945), he is moved to relate the story as he saw it happen and as he now looks back on its meaning.

By William H. Stringer

Drawings by Gene Langley, Staff Artist

I

THIS was the drear December
Ten distant, vanished years ago
When through the Ardennes mist and drizzle
Unexpected, clanked the Nazi panzers.
This, Hitler's final try for triumph,
Biggest pitched battle of World War Two
On any American front.
Scream the eagle, roar the lion,
Ride the Valkyrie maidens!
We hardly remember all of it now—
When Paris went on curfew and New York prayed,
When hopes wrote small and headlines large,
Bastogne became a legend like Verdun,
When Georgie Patton and his star-spangled jeep
And pearl revolvers wrought like Paul Bunyan.
When Eisenhower, the general's general,
And Bradley, the soldier's soldier,
And Monty, who said "This won't do . . ."
Worked to hold the shoulders, block the surge
Of the rampant tanks, the gray-clad infantry,
When the foot-slogging GIs, rallying,
And the tank commanders, driving
The Shermans slithering over icy roads,
Resourceful, resilient, did themselves proud . . .
Heroes, heroes, enough and to spare,
Among the dark hills and the falling snow.
This was the drear December
This was the Battle of the Bulge
Ten swift-receding years ago.

II

The Air Force Colonel, with experienced eye,
Said to his war correspondents, "We'll fly
To visit the three Tactical Air Commands,
Watch fighters zoom when a ground hog demands.
You can talk, too, with Bradley, Hodges, and Patton,
Now who has a gripe or an ultimatum?
I know, you want something to stop the press;
The Air Force tries to oblige! . . . I confess
The front is a little quiet. But remember
I said something'll turn up, this December.
It always does when the Air Force flies a party."

Unconvinced, a dozen newshawks from the hearty
Cuisine of the fabulous Scribe Hotel, set out
In a bucket-seat job for the West front. At about
The same moment, Cologneward, Nazi tank crews
Were gunning their thousand engines. The news
Was going to be considerable . . .

III

Remember the mood of those days?
Roosevelt was in the White House,
Meat rationing in the markets.
"Ike" was running a war from Versailles,
Not working for peace from the White House.
General MacArthur was driving back to Manila
Via the Pacific Isles—Guadalcanal, Tarawa—
His finest Korean hours still far ahead.
The atom bomb was an unproved, deep-laid secret.
Russia was an ally, and we impatiently stamped
For the vast Russian Army to emerge
From quarters and begin its winter offensive.
Europe was war-ravaged and its houses
Cold as the December stars which seldom shone.
America's heart was overseas with her young men.
There was no Liberace, no titillating TV,
But Glenn Miller's band played in London
At the Rainbow Corner Red Cross Club;
London had a deep blackout.
And on the Western Front impatient Patton
Was about to resume the rugged attack at Metz.
The cross-France blitz was spent and we Were struggling to blast our way through
That complex of steel, cement, and fire
Known as the Siegfried Line.

IV

Yes, Hitler planned it,
Tenacious as ever.
The technique was simple:
"Audacious or never!"

Surprise the Allies through
The weak-held Ardennes,
Repeat 1940
All over again.

Split Monty from Bradley,
Seize supplies and keep roaring.
Be in Antwerp the seaport
While the West still is snoring.

The Entente then is split,
Comes apart at the seams.
This Hitler imagines
In his mystical dreams.

Canada gone from the war,
Britain limping home lame,
The States talking peace
And quitting the game. . . .

Nothing, of course, went
According to plan.
But (76,000 American and 81,000
German casualties) that was a price to pay
Man to man.

V

From General Bradley's intelligence officer, 12th Army Group Headquarters, Dec. 16, 1944:

"It is now certain
That attrition is steadily sapping
The strength of German forces. . . .
And the crust of defense is thinner,
More brittle and more vulnerable
Than it appears on our G-2 maps,
Or to the troops in the lines."

Substance of additional briefing from General Bradley's intelligence officer to SHAEF war correspondents touring the front:

"But we know the enemy has troops in reserve.
Elements of the Sixth Panzer Army
Have been spotted. The Fifth Panzer Army
Has been pulled from the lines.
What the enemy does with these reserves
Is exceedingly important.
We hope he commits them piecemeal,
As he did in Normandy.
Then we shall continue to grind them up
Until he has no reserves left at all.
But if he should commit them all at once
He could cause a lot of trouble."

VI

Now,
Across the wide canvas of the holiday-hilled Ardennes
Rolls the dull thunder of the surprise attack.
The crashing artillery barrage rouses,
Sleepy-eyed, the fresh-arrived, battle-green
Boys of the Golden Lion (106th) Division.
Out of the eerie mists poke the long-nosed 88's,
The Tiger tanks with their carefully husbanded fuel.
Three German armies march abreast,
Sepp Dietrich's Sixth Panzer, Manteuffel's Fifth,
The Seventh Army under Brandenberger.
Skorzeny, the blond giant, Hitler's favorite,
Launches parachutists to seize crossroads,
Sends Germans treacherously in GI jeeps and clothing
To grab the vital bridges at the Meuse . . .
Thus the dark Fascist evil struck again
Before those who embodied it could be disarmed.
Thus the German, whom Gibbon once foresaw
As standing Europe's guard 'gainst Eastern Hun,
Kept to his sad, mistaken destiny
Until defeat at last should bring some changes
And the dark German warlordism be back driven
By a fitful-glowing glimpse of Europe's oneness.
And Manteuffel who led the grim December tanks
Should sit in a Parliament seat at Bonn
And watch against the renaissance of Prussianism. . . .

The thin-stretched battle line breaches, melts,
And all is confusion, scramble, and retreat,
For this was the "ghost front" of calculated risk
This stretch of line had purposely been stripped
To carry the strong American attacks north and south.
Four sparse divisions, two untested, and two Licking wounds from the Hürtgen Forest mauling,
Patrolled the eighty miles. And the Nazi Panzers
Went through like a poker through tissue paper.
(The U.S. First Army initially reported that
A small enemy counterattack had occurred Somewhere in Belgium.)

VII

"Yo ho, this has been an incredible night,
With Nazi planes out, and chutes drifting down,
We must be in for a fairly big fight,
First Army HQ is quitting the town."

"Shall we travel?" "Here comes another V-1
Aimed directly for Liege if it's able To boom-boom that far." "The motor's cut. Run!"
"Or better, hide under the table."

"The plane's waiting, boys. The fog's getting thick; Let's board that cloud-hopping jalopy."
"But here's the big news you promised us, Slick!
And where can we file this hot copy?"

VIII

Sadly GIs ripped the posters
From the Belgian village halls
Spelling "U.S. Christmas Party";
Sadly parceled out the candy
Which they'd saved from weekly rations
Saved for Belgian boys and girls
Saved to play the local Santa
With their candy rations hoarded . . .
Sad-eyed, too, the Belgian children.

"Sometimes, as in a drifting mist,
I can see them now . . .
. . . the empty Ardennes road;
The tall pines split and splintered
As by a thousand lightning bolts,
And in the snowy hilltop pasture
The black hulks of tanks, abandoned. . . ."

And the Belgian mères and pères
Saw the trucks in hasty pull-out,
Knew the Nazis were returning
Buried deep their Allied flags.
"What, oh what shall now befall us?"
Wailed they, watching down the road.

IX

They fought for seven days and seven nights.
They met and slowed the first fanatic thrusts.
They set the brakes at road blocks and command posts.
They retreated when outflanked on every side.
Sometimes they ran the wrong way and were captured.
Sometimes they fought off tanks with hand grenades,
Sometimes they didn't run at all.
This was the record of thousands of American soldiers,
This was particularly the story of Staff Sergeant
James Williams of Altoona, Pa.
He came red-eyed and scraggly-bearded from the lines
To give eyewitness account of the withdrawal.
"The Jerries had plenty of tanks," he affirmed.
"They rolled up and fired point-blank at our command post.
We threw everything we had at them—
Rifles, mortars, hand grenades, and artillery.
But they kept on coming.
Every man in my platoon used a weapon,
Including our switchboard operator."
Yes, it was a retreat which showed the enemy
Their breakthrough wouldn't be a walkaway.
"Jerry began to figure there was really Something out there ahead of him," Commented Sergeant Williams of Altoona.

X

How was it with you that Christmas time?
Were you in the jungle war of the Pacific?
Or were you in Europe, and suddenly minus
A Christmas leave aimed at the gay spots of Paree?
Or were you waiting at home and in receipt
Of a War Department telegram: "Missing in Action"
And discovered joyfully, later, that "Missing," for thousands caught in the December onslaught, meant in fact
"Safe"—well, relatively safe in a German Prison camp.
The redoubtable Scribe Hotel, war
Correspondents' rendezvous, canceled
Its Christmas party. And there was a Rumor about that the Jerries were out to Kidnap Eisenhower, and security guards
Were doubled around Versailles.
And passes were not enough at roadblocks;
You had to tell the level-eyed MPs
Who the Dodgers were, or who won
The American League Pennant last summer
To prove you were an American
And not a disguised Skorzeny trooper. . . .
You wouldn't have imagined then, would you,
That five, nay three years later, a giant plan
Would be launched, named after the U.S. Army
Chief of staff, one Marshall, to restore the land
And bind the old wounds, physical and mental,
And a German would be invited to sit in
On Western Europe's conferences.
Thus quickly did the wind die down. . . .
Perhaps you were in Allied Military Government
(Located in the drafty Versailles stables)
And dreaming maybe rather heady dreams
Of how old Germany could be rehabilitated—
Not as a pastoral land of serfs and vassals
Nor as a resurgent pack of robber barons
But "clothed and in its right mind,"
An industrial nation benefiting humanity
And Europe all about restored and sunny.

XI

Well, they knew in New York now,
If they didn't know it before:
The Boys wouldn't be Home for Christmas.
But at the war front "Ike" and his Generals
Conferred with determination, not gloom,
As the order of the day.
Patton wanted to let the unprintable Jerries
Ride all the unprintable way to Paris
And then we'd cut them off at their Unprintable base.
But the strategy adopted was somewhat wiser:
Hold the shoulders of the penetration,
Hold the salient's shoulders at all cost,
Blunt the nose of the spearhead
When the juggernaut slowed and time was ripe.
So Patton left off the Metz attack, eastward,
Swung his whole army an unheard-of Ninety degrees and began attacking northward.
So Hodges, above the salient where Patton was below,
Abandoned the Roer Dam attacks
And began feeding in First Army divisions
To plug the gaps on the northern flank
Where the enemy probed for a breakthrough.
And some got chewed, and some chewed the Nazis,
But the flanks, north and south, stood firm
And Bastogne, thorn in the southern flank,
Hub of the Ardennes road network,
Totally invested by enemy divisions,
Stood like a rock. And Brigadier General
"Tony" McAuliffe (according to press reports
But perhaps not actually) said "Nuts"
To the German demand for surrender.
And Patton finally drove through a wedge
To the relief of Bastogne—and then Declared himself ready to eliminate
The entire Bulge.

XII

There's a story—may be phony—
Of the scribe who by mistake
Got to Bastogne (was it Arnhem?)
When the ground began to shake.

This reporter'd spent his war days
Interviewing lads from home,
Hailed from Maine and sought out Maine lads,
Writing up each gripe and groan.

As the awful din crescendoed
Our young scribe was looking blue
When a Colonel sought to cheer him,
"You've a scoop here! Is it true

There's not another newsman with us?
Write, boy, and your fame is plain!"
Sighed the newshawk, "But sir, Colonel,
I can't find a man from Maine."

XIII

"I'd be glad if we could just keep walking,
Walking and talking, so to speak,
If you don't mind. I'm just arrived
On leave in Paris from the lines.
There's not much worth while talking in a foxhole.
I do a lot of thinking though. . . .
Oh sure, Paris is quite a town,
I don't much crave the gay spots though, just now,
I'd rather talk to somebody, and walk,
Walk maybe half the night. . . . You know,
I don't pretend to understand these things,
I used to do some hunting there back in Georgia
On my dad's farm with the dog and my gun,
But this is a different kind of hunting
And I've been at it pretty long. . . .
You get to thinking sometimes in the darkness,
You wonder out there, before you fall asleep,
About this killing and this killing.
This isn't the kind of work a man was meant
To be in, is it?
Someone's got to do it, I suppose,
But how did things get in this mess?
You're a writer, maybe you know high policy,
Is somebody working on these things,
So when this hunting season's over
Maybe there can be a way to see
The season doesn't open up again?
Let's walk up this street. What's the sign say?
"Rue de la Paix"—wonder what that means? . . .
It's mighty nice to see this city, mind you;
They've given me a hotel billet. The beds
Each have two sheets on, white and clean,
And that's a very restful combination."

XIV

Christmas Day the sun shone brightly,
Fogs slipped off between the mountains.
Then resumed the Air its pounding,
Tremendous was the Allied onslaught
Flying sorties by the thousands
Blasting Nazi truck and transport
Caught on narrow Ardennes roadways,

Then began the great reduction
Of the West front's grim reversal,
Fighting back through icy snowdrifts
Fighting winter and the foeman
Keeping up relentless pressure
On the zero-tempered hilltops
Through the picture-postcard valleys.
Until Hitler scrapped his program,
Told old Rundstedt, told friend Model,
Just to chew up our divisions,
Never mind the distant Antwerp
Never mind the far Atlantic
Just destroy the arms before them . . .
But the Allies did the chewing
Did the blasting and the hewing.
January brought the bulge down
And by February—early—
Hitler's badly battered Army
Back inside the Westwall stumbled . . .
Two months later had surrendered!

XV

Sometimes, as in a drifting mist,
I can see them now—
The line of tanks rolling through Verviers,
Hurrying to plug the desperate gap;
Bradley, gentleman schoolmaster at the charts,
Showing how the battles would be fought;
The glimpse aloft in clearing morning haze,
Of flashing silver pinpoints in the sun,
A hundred Flying Fortresses passing over;
The midnight square in Paris, silent, shuttered,
Waiting the verdict from the distant hills . . .
A month later, driving the empty Ardennes road;
The tall pines split and splintered
As by a thousand lightning bolts,
And in the snowy hilltop pasture
The black hulks of tanks, abandoned,
Uncouth like some strange mechanisms from Mars . . .
And finally, all haste and heartbreak ended,
The warm Red Cross Club back in Paris,
Long after hours, just sitting round a darkened table
While the young lieutenant coaxed tender chords
And old sweet music from the dour piano,
"Margie," and "Time On My Hands."

XVI

This was the somber setback.
After the heady advance,
This was the time of testing
After the blitz across France.

We had best remember how it was those days
Now that man has fabricated worse instruments.
The Bulge was Civil War-type fighting;
Now we have something more than early radar,
Deadlier than the proximity fuse, bigger than
The blockbuster, wider than the A-bomb.
We have the county-demolishing H-bomb.
And let no man think that 1944's
Wilderness Campaign in 20th Century garb
Presented all the hardship and the heartache
That another global war would wreak.
But—need there be another holocaust,
Need evil erupt again in savage force
Because it has not been damped down by wise foresight?
We learned us something from this dark December
And men who learned are with us now to profit,
Eisenhower for instance; he who in Normandy
And at the Bulge perceived the face of war;
And now as President he sends broadcast
A Christmas message, simple, eloquent, heart-learned:
"With our friends we must enlarge
The design of our partnership
So that we, who marched together in evil days
When war and fear of war darkened the earth,
Shall enjoy together in days of light
The rich rewards of a secure and stable era."

We learned, at the Ardennes command posts
The perils of overconfidence and underconcern.
We're no longer "the nation of the completed ball game,"
A populace thrilling at the joy ride across France
And then, with the ninth inning almost won,
Hastening home, demobilizing, and leaving the world
To totter, and to fester. No, the President
Says man must gird himself to thwart
The four horsemen of the modern mental world:
"Inertia, despair, statism, and materialism";
He speaks something profound here.
And for these tasks we do have great resources:
Assurance that a free people doesn't panic
When hard hit by the sudden adverse blow
But calmly and sensibly proceeds
To set things on the upward course again.
And more than this—far more—we have something
Always present but not always understood,
A radar for right conduct which clearly sees
"The path which no fowl knoweth,"
And a Power, strong as the everlasting hills
Which quenches alike the nighttime terror
And the new bomb's "destruction that wasteth at noonday,"
When His protection and blessing
Are sought aright.

XVII

The winter-clad battle of the dark Ardennes
Is history. But the chemicalization
Of these churning, struggling years
When Truth, the overturning, is on the march
Need not repeat the evil detonations
And past experience, thrice-magnified, of war.
Not if, in the Christmas words of Eisenhower,
We are "strong and courageous and wise"; not if We act "in accord with the Divine will."
It's up to us.

Dear Mr. Murrow.

I thank you for your kind acknowledgement of my letter, and I am glad to know that you did not think the contents entirely crazy.

I am happy to have it with you and sincerely hope I may hear from you again at a later date. In the meantime I hope you enjoy your vacation and your travels.

Dear Mrs. Stindley:

Very many thanks for your long and interesting letter.

Your idea is certainly an intriguing one. It is impossible to say offhand where one would find a sponsor for such a project and unfortunately I cannot give it any immediate thought because my programs are about to go off the air for the summer and I am about to embark on some rather extensive traveling.

However, leave the idea with me if you will and perhaps something can be done after I get back in the autumn.

Sincerely yours,

Mrs. Elsie Stindley

Dear Mr. Morrow,

No doubt you will be surprised to receive a rather lengthy epistle from someone of whom you have never heard, but I hope you will have the time and patience to read it, and whatever you may think, I hope you will believe its sincerity.

Since your stay here during the way, your commentaries etc. you are so well known to many English people, and I would like to say how much we enjoyed seeing you on television during our General Election, also how much we also enjoyed your programme taking us into the homes of famous people. I have been tempted to write to you for a considerable time but felt a little diffident about doing so. Since Mr. Aidan Crawley's interesting series "American Neighbours" such temptation has been to the fore quite often and then seeing you on television recently, well, here goes....

First of all let me tell you something about myself. I am just an ordinary English woman, a housewife and mother of a son 23 and a daughter 18. I do a great deal of public work, I have been a Councillor for almost ten years, and this brings me into contact with many people in different spheres of life, various organisations, associations and so on. I have a deep affection for your country and her people, among whom I have made many friends, such friends both here and in America would be willing I know to vouch for my integrity. My house is Liberty Hall to many of your countrymen and women who are temporarily stationed over here, and through them and discussions and conversations with my own countrywomen, I am amazed how little we know of each other. Many of my Americab friends and visitors often say "You know you could be an American" and I think "..and you could be English'. In our hearts and ideals we are fundamentally so much alike, and it is this awareness which really prompts me to write to you. I am prhaps lucky and privileged to be able to meet so many of you, but, knowing you socially and as visitors to my home, does not mean I know you as a nation, so what chance is there of my fellow countrywomen, not so fortunate as myself, to get to know you at all? Many exchanges of visits are made by V.I.P'S, statesmen, high ranking officers etc. who discuss nuclear warfare, Four Power Talks etc. productivity teams go and study production methods and so on, and on their return they'blind us with science', overwhelm us with figures and statistics, and the average man and woman not one bit nearer understanding you or know ing you. On the other hand many well known people have made visits to our respective countries, make darn silly statements, sometimes rude, these are given prominence, and because they are ordinary are lapped up, read learnt and inwardly digested by millions of people because it is something they can understand (or minunderstand) better than figures and statistics which leave the average person cold, unfortunately these are the things which stick in peoples minds, remembered and trotted out for a fresh airing whenever criticism is brought up about either country, and gone are the memories of Lease Lend, which was our very lifeline, gone also are the memories of those wonderful notes pinned to the little garments contained in the Bundles for Britain, and thinking us an ungrateful nation gone to I should imagine are the kind and sympathetic memories of a nation who fof 12 months stood alone, backs to the wall, the only bulwark to maintain a decent civilisation, a tiny island upon which all eyes were fixed. You know Mr. Morrow it was'nt a picnic. To build something big and lasting one must start at the bottom with solid foundations, if it isnt to topple over, and I feel sure that a sound and understanding knowledge of each other, between the ordinary people, who are the backbone of any nation, would be a step in the right direction and I think a great deal could be done if'Mrs. England' and 'Mrs. Amdrica' got together and started the ball rolling, dont you? I should dearly love to visit your country, not to... stay at the Waldorf Astoria, see the Empire State Building, visit Niagara Falls, meet film stars, walk down Broadway and Fifth Avenue etc. but to meet ordinary American families, visit their homes, see their way of life, to ask them questions and to be able to answer theirs, to be able to come back and tell the women in England that the lives of their American counterparts do not centre round refrigerators, deep freezes, washing machines, bridge parties and Hollywood film stars. I would like to visit your hospitals and to see the maternity side of it, which I understand is incorporated in a General Hospital, to report back to my Divisional Health Committee; to visit the equivalent in America of our Womens Institutes and Townswomens Guild, come back and BE ABLE to answer the bombardment of questions I know they would ask; to visit Childrens Homes (including a certain Foundling Home which is run by nuns), Old Peoples Homes and Clubs, and be able to report to my Childrens and Welfare Committees how they compare with ours and very probably introduce some new ideas from actual observations. To get a sound knowledge of your education system from kindergarten to College, (I am a Manager or Governor of seven schools in England). I should like to visit an Indian Camp and Meet a real live 'Red Injun', so I could start with the youngest children in schools and arouse their interest in the most attractive way to them, Cowboys and Indians is still a favourtie game among English kiddies. To begin and carry on through Junior, High and Grammar Schools study appropriate subjects, i.e. curriculum, studies, sports, recreation, holidays, uniforms, dress, cosmetics and dates which I know English girls would love to know about, this is a wide field I know, but imbue them with interest from the beginning they would grow up wanting to know more, and with such basic knowledge would be able, the better to discriminate when the occasion arose. Through the medium of radio I should like to invite questions from my American sisters, and to speak to them on our equivalent of "Womans Hour". From my contacts with American people over here, I am amazed at their thirst for knowledge, the number of questions they ask, particularly about the war, i.e. "Tell us about the war here", "What were your felings when France capitulated and what were those twelve months like". Questions about bombing, rationing , evacuation,

A.R.P. (I was an Air Raid Warden and Billeting Officer and the stories said and amusing are many). I remember one day and American friend came here just as I was returning from my weekly shopping, and as I emptied my basket, her face was a study, and her comment, "Say honey, I guess your grocer would be real mad having to weigh up those bits", and how genuinely appalled she was to know that was all I was allowed for the whole family. This was years after the war. It was only last year we went off the ration except for coal, and that is still rationed. I wondr how many American women werd in the same position as myself, the fifth Christmas after the was, I had not the ingredients to make a Christmas cake. I think they would allow for a little bitterness if they could understand what it felt like to pick up a magazine (not so very long after the war) and read and see pictures of 'An American housewife goes shopping'. Oh, the inside of that store, Del Monte, Libby, Armours, etc. etc. names from another world and we were receiving one tin of fruit per family every six months if we were lucky, in fact fruit allocation has only just ceased. A sense of humour has been my salvation on more than one occasion, I have probably a keener sense of humour than most people, but by Jove, it wore thin on many occasions.

As I said before whilst fully appreciating and enjoying Mr. Crawleys series it covered anothhr angle, but not that field of understanding which I would like to see established, SO.... being who you are and what you are, (and I wonder I have the temerity to type the following, if I were not so much in earnest, I would'nt) dont you know anyone who would sponser such a visit. If I were in the financial position to do it myself, I give you my word, I would. I wonder what your reactions are now, do you think this worthwhile or just hooey, whatever you think I would ask you to please believe its sincerety.

If I had any free time I would like to see the White House, the inside of the United Nations Building, to have you explain for my own edification only, and not publication, the ethics of Mc.Carthyism, the colour discrimination, the working of your Senate, House of Representatives and Congress.

Well, 'Thank you Mr. Morrow' if you have had the patience to read to the end of this 'budget'and if you have had to wipe your brow and say "Whew, thats a tall order"please believe I am not such a battle axe as this letter may lead you to believd,because if I should receive an acknowledgment I would, no doubt, be filled with confusion and wonder how I had the nerve to write to you at all.

With kind regards,

Yours very sincerely,

Elsie Studley

Dear Mr. St. Whitelock:

Many thanks for your letter of August 29th.

I regret very much to have to tell you that I have decided that I cannot undertake to write the book you suggest.

It is an intriguing task for someone, but it involves a tremendous amount of study, and unfortunately my already very heavy schedule precludes the possibility of my even attempting it.

I shall be interested to know whom you persuade to undertake the book.

Dear Mr. Murrow:

It would be very helpful to me in handling my perennial problem of list building and scheduling books for the future if you could let me have a decision on my suggestion in my letter to you of August 29.

It would, of course, give me the greatest pleasure to learn that the suggestion for the proposed book had intrigued your interest. Should you feel definitely unable to undertake this project, I shall have to assign it to another writer who will, I feel, handle the subject competently, but, alas, probably not as definitively or authoritatively as you yourself could do.

Dear Mr. Murrow:

Some time ago I asked a New York literary agent to discuss with you the possibility of doing for us a book on a specific idea which I suggested. Miss Holder tells me, however, that she does not recall that the matter was ever brought directly to your attention, and I therefore venture to do so now on my own initiative.

The book I suggest could be a greatly needed and compelling study of social responsibility. The responsibility is that of the various commentators--those on television, radio, and in newspapers, who have achieved a monopoly in interpreting the news and who have acquired a following which must total in the millions. As a serious study, the book would naturally retail no personal scandal, except in the remote instance where such appearances might have an effect on personal opinion, but it should definitely stress anything in the commentator's background which would make his opinions or his purpose suspect. Certain obvious personalities would necessarily be included--Gabriel Heatter, Drew Pearson, Walter Winchell, Fulton Lewis, Jr., David Lawrence, Westbrook Pegler, and numerous others whose names will immediately occur to you. As I envision it, the proposed study should consider them not alone as individuals, expounding a particular social point of view, but as persons having a definite and long-range impact on the public mind. Their capacity and their performance for good and evil should be thoroughly examined and assessed. To be of value, it seems to me also that the study must not limit itself either to "good" or "bad", but must impartially examine all the prominent practitioners in the field.

I recognize, of course, that this can be a very touchy subject for one who is himself an outstanding exponent of the art, but I nevertheless venture to hope that the importance of the study will commend itself to you. I hope likewise that it would not be too onerous an undertaking, since I assume that your very capable research staff might be able to work up most of the preliminary material on which to base your judgments.

Should the suggestion intrigue your interest, I should be delighted to discuss it with you further over the luncheon table.

This is merely a note to thank you for your kind offer to send me your prized target pistols.

My thanks again for taking the time to write to me as you did.

Dear Sir:

Of you I am asking a favor- which to say the least- must be different. Viz.

It is my desire to lend you- for the period of five years- my prized target pistols- which I assure are highly special- and will be a lot of fun for you and Casey.

The conditions, responsibilities and guarantees I shall demand of you are simple and easily and eloquently expressed thusly,

And rest assured I have a definite and positive reason for making this offer, which is that I am saving these arms for my grandson who is at least five years too young- and when the time comes for him to take possession will prize them all the more for having been used and enjoyed by the Murrows.

The automatic happens to be the individual arm with which Mr. J. H. FitzGerald shot the best single target during a career of professional shooting of thirty years. The single shot is the arm with which your humble servant hit a bullseye exactly the size of a penny more than 350 times without a single miss.

Furthermore I will guarantee that if you will follow my suggestions- you will be able to hit a nickel nineteen out of twenty shots, at fifty feet- with a training period of not to exceed sixty days and two thousand shots.

These reasons are good enough for me. If they are good enough for you- will you please give shipping instructions and the arms will be on their way to you within thirty days.

Dear Mr. Murrow:

Your letter arrived yesterday and I drove out to Culver City to the R. K. O. Pathe Studios with it.

I didn't tell you the details in my first letter but the producer is Sam Bishoff, and the picture is THE PHOENIX STORY, about the city in Alabama.

Bishoff is all for securing your services. His suggestion yesterday was for me to ask if you could do a short naration (prologue idea) preceeding the picture while background shots of the city are being shown on film? The amount of time he stated, "would be two or three hours a day for a couple of days, at your convienence." If this is not possible the prologue could be done in your office on tape and then transposed onto film.

Mr. Bishoff said he should like to submit a manuscript to you by his representative in N. Y. C., if under any condition you'll consider the possibilities of this undertaking for him.

Thanking you for giving this matter your further attention. I remain -

IN MEMORIAM

COPY

Today all over America we gather to commemorate those who have served their Country and especially the ones who never returned to the homes they had gone out to protect.

White crosses all over the world express our recognition of their supreme sacrifices.

Never has this gratitude been put in more superb fashion than by President Lincoln at Gettysburg in November 1863, when he said at the end of his immortal talk:

> "It is for us the living rather to be dedicated here to the unfinished work which they who fought here have thus far so nobly advanced. It is rather for us to be here dedicated to the great task remaining before us -- that from these honored head we take increased devotion to that cause for which they gave the last full measure of devotion -- we here highly resolve that these dead shall not have died in vain, that this nation under God shall have a new birth of freedom, and that government of the people, by the people, for the people shall not perish from the earth."

This resolution expressed by Lincoln is at least as important today as it was then, because, in the words of Winston Churchill some 18 years ago, it would again appear that the lights of freedom are going out, all over the world.

COPY

Because of our desire for individual and national freedom, along with our happy way of life, we are prone to take things for granted -- in our desire to believe in the sincerity of that possible enemy, the great and growing Communist imperialism.

Too often we accept shadows for substances -- and thereupon follow the natural inclination of any free nation to lower its guard while accepting gladly the conciliatory gestures of the possible enemy.

Perhaps never in the history of the United States, however, have the American people awakened to such disillusionment as this morning -- expressed in the death of the so-called Geneva Spirit.

And yet as recently as this week those of us who have urged for years this country stay strong in order to stay free have been reviled by critics from the far right -- who put figures before forces -- as we always are reviled by critics from the far left.

These right wing critics are especially wrong because if we did stop building our military defenses on the basis of tradition and start building them on the basis of progress, we could reduce our military budget by billions of dollars annually, an opinion expressed in recent months by the Hoover Commission. This would make it possible to balance the national budget, reduce taxes, and at the same time have a more integrated and therefore more effective defense.

Nobody wants permanent world peace more than I. My disarmament resolution sponsored in the last Congress, S.71, is the only disarmament resolution passed by the Senate which recommends a specific disarmament plan. It was co-sponsored by forty-seven other senators, and passed unanimously.

I believe that resolution presented a practical plan looking towards permanent world peace.

The American people should take every opportunity to negotiate with the Communists, but we should never lower our defense guard. We never want to find ourselves in the same position in the late '50s which the British found themselves in in the late '30s.

The Geneva Spirit which came out of the meeting in that city last July showed the world clearly that the United States desired permanent world peace. Nevertheless, since that meeting -- not four months ago -- we have had many additions to world tension; viz., the selling of arms by the Communists to Egypt, the recent fighting between Egypt and Israel, the controversy between three NATO partners -- Greece, Turkey and Great Britain -- over Cyprus, the uprisings against French rule in North Africa, the results of the Adenauer visit to Moscow, and the recent vote in the Saar. To these tensions since Geneva we can now add the supreme disillusionment -- the greatest Armistice Day lesson this country could ever have -- the end of the so-called Geneva Spirit as expressed in no uncertain terms by Molotov on his return this week from the Kremlin.

And now therefore, once again, we are forced to take stock of our relative strength as against the enemy. Always remember the word relative. It is the most important of all.

In an official address released by the Department of Defense last month, a member of the U. S. Joint Chiefs of Staff (that body which by law is the military adviser to the President as well as the Secretary of Defense) stated:

"The Communists have thousands more combat airplanes than we do.

"If being ahead is related to aircraft production, we are again only second best. The Communists are producing far more combat airplanes than we are.

"Even more important, if being ahead is related to rate of progress, we have fallen far behind.

Eleven years ago we had the world's largest aircraft industry, turning out the world's finest airplanes by the tens of thousands. At that time, what was left of the Soviet aircraft industry was rudimentary compared to ours. Yet, in eleven years, Soviet science and industry have provided the Soviet Union with the world's largest air force, equipped with modern, high performance airplanes."

The Department of Defense admits that the Communists are already far ahead of us, on the ground and under the sea. (They have hundreds of divisions as against our planned fifteen -- and hundreds more submarines than we have.)

A recent critic of those who questioned our plan to stay strong said: "She (Russia) is muddled and poor".

That statement about the Communists would be hard to sell to the ghosts of the German armies destroyed before Stalingrad -- or to the American fliers who lost their lives at the start of the Korean war because their planes were inferior to the Russian-built MIG 15s.

When I was in England during the summer of 1937, most British leaders, with the conspicuous exception of Winston Churchill, were laughing at the efforts of the man with the little mustache.

Fourteen months later Britain suffered the humiliation of Munich. Less than three years after that, when I arrived in England before the United States entered the war -- early spring, 1941 -- it was clear that, despite their great courage, the British could not stave off defeat by themselves.

COPY

They had listened too long to the siren song of some of their leaders who put "figures before forces".

When Hitler struck, therefore, their guard was down.

Britain and the free world were saved eventually, but only because the United States went in behind them, at a cost to us of tens of billions of dollars and tens of thousands of lives.

It is now generally agreed that this country is the one real power left in the free world capable of resisting advancing communism."

Who is behind us as we were behind England?

That is why I have urged for many years that this country be relatively strong, so as to back up our diplomats as they continue to negotiate for permanent world peace.

Let me repeat again the resolution of the great Lincoln, because it is at least as applicable today as it was nearly 100 years ago:

"We here highly resolve that these dead shall not have died in vain, that this nation under God shall have a new birth of freedom, and that government of the people, by the people, for the people shall not perish from the earth."

COPY

We all have the same goal -- a free and prosperous America for our children, and our children's children.

Original letter not received

Dear Mr. Morrow:

I'm taking this opportunity to write to you and to remind you that a couple of months ago, I sent you with the respect and good wishes of our organization, the detailed information and invitation of our International anti-Communist convention, which is to take place in Miami, Florida on the 20, 21 and 22nd of February 1955.

It is rather strange to us that a great patriot as you claim to be, has disregarded an honest, constructive fight against the Godless Asiatic enemy of our land. It is because Senator Joseph McCarthy, is an honored life member? Mr. Morrow: The American Constitution is the most human instrument that God or man has devised, should we fail to improve upon it, it would still be the best that man has ever known. The American way is, God's way. God has given it to the American people, and it is for them to preserve it'. You being an American, you are willing to do your part, am I correct? Just because some one is associated with us that is poison to you, it is no reason that your personal feelings should supersede our national interest. I am a foreign born, but the preservation of the American way of life is the most important matter in my life. I am ready to give my all for its protection and perpetuation. No matter who is on the team with me, all the reward I ask for, is the knowledge that I have been able to inspire my fellow Americans with my devotion to my adopted country. I have never been paid for my patriotism either!

This Mr. Morrow, is my way of talking to all those who because of personal grudge, fail to be of service to their country.

Yours truly,
Stephen Szabo

Nothing could give the community or myself more pleasure than the news that you will speak at the "Citizen of the Year" dinner in May. Knowing the heavy schedule you carry I could only hope you would be able to find the time, for you were my first choice for speaker on this (to me) memorable

Arrangements finally have been made for the plaque to fill that "bare spot" on the BBC wall, as per arrangements discussed in the attached.

The plaque itself was photographed before leaving Washington and a copy is enclosed. The first four lines were written by Ed Murrow -- the balance by me. The plaque is silver, oval shaped, on an ebony back. Reason for the oval: It must be placed in the center; as I understand it, all others are the usual squares or oblongs.

I'll report to you after the event.

Dear Mr. Taishoff:

In reply to your letter of August 26 addressed to Mr. Washburn, and as per our two telephone conversations, I have the pleasure of informing you that I have just received the following telegram from Mr. W. Bradley Connors, our Public Affairs Officer in London:

> "Plaque ceremony presentation tentatively scheduled 5:30 p.m. Monday September 26 at BBC Broadcast House pending approval Ambassador."

The reason for the last three words of the telegram is that Mr. Aldrich is not in London at the moment. However, I understand from Mr. Connors that there is every reason to believe that the Ambassador will agree to this arrangement.

As you know, Mr. Streibert will be unable to accept your kind invitation to attend the ceremony. It so happens, however, that Mr. William Clark, Assistant Director for Europe, will be in London at that time and will represent Mr. Streibert.

The American Universities Field Staff was founded in 1951 by a group of universities and colleges whose leaders felt that available sources of data on contemporary foreign societies were inadequate. Academic communities are being called upon to concern themselves with developments abroad, but few can finance individually the necessary additional faculty and research programs. Even where there are scholars in these fields, there are problems of providing them with fresh materials. A regular flow of independent, reputable, scholarly information from abroad is important for teaching as well as for the information of Americans generally. Initiated to help meet these educational and public needs, the AUFS is a nonprofit membership corporation directed by a Board of Trustees on which the sponsoring universities and colleges have permanent majority representation.

STAFF AND PROGRAM

The AUFS has a regular staff of men appointed by the Board of Trustees. Each staff member is an American whose basic training and years of residence and study in a foreign area qualify him to follow and evaluate developments in that region. He has been chosen for an unusual combination of qualities, including wide personal experience and contacts, command of the principal local languages, skill in combining scholarship with reportorial curiosity, and effectiveness in writing and speaking. He works under continuing scrutiny of the Trustees and faculty members of their institutions.

Each AUFS man makes regular and extended stays in his foreign area. His frequent letters and reports, which are reproduced and distributed by the AUFS, describe and analyze important developments. They provide teaching and research materials and at the same time are a source of up-to-date information for any student of affairs abroad.

The Field Staff is regarded in the sponsoring institutions as a corps of able area specialists whose contributions reinforce the work of resident faculties. Its present strength is twelve. These include men who deal with countries in Eastern and Southeastern Asia, the Near and Middle East, Sub-Saharan Africa, Eastern and Southern Europe, and Latin America. Major emphasis is on areas in respect to which university offerings have been relatively scanty. As the AUFS staff grows it is planned to maintain the present emphasis, but it also will be possible to extend the coverage.

SUBSCRIPTION ARRANGEMENTS

Until very recently the reports of AUFS field men were distributed only to the campuses of the sponsoring universities and colleges. The Trustees preferred to explore and test the usefulness of these reports within their own institutions. The experiment has worked so well that the Trustees have now provided that any educational institution in North America can obtain AUFS reports--currently numbering more than sixty a year--under the following arrangements:

1. Each subscribing institution will receive all AUFS reports in as many copies as may be needed, to a maximum of 35. (Experience indicates that 35 copies will normally serve primarily-interested faculty members, departmental offices, library sections, and administrators.)

2. The annual supporting subscription is $500 for universities and larger colleges; $250 for institutions with fewer than 850 students.

Similar subscription arrangements have been established for nonacademic organizations. Among the educational institutions that have already entered supporting subscriptions are Haverford and Macalester Colleges, Harvard University, and the Universities of California (Berkeley), Southern California, and Minnesota.

OTHER ACTIVITIES

AUFS men are brought home periodically--usually at the end of eighteen months. This permits them to maintain contact with American life and scholarship and helps to insure their objectivity in observing the foreign scene. While in the United States they take part in programs at the sponsoring universities and colleges. (This service is distinct from the one that provides letters and reports to institutions that are supporting subscribers.) At present four AUFS men visit these campuses each year. Each man stays on each campus for ten days. He participates in classes and seminars, consults with faculty members and students, and meets campus and community groups for lectures or discussions. In short, he serves as a source man in respect to the foreign area that is his specialty. The series of AUFS visits provides sponsoring institutions with a continuing survey of affairs in foreign areas.

As the staff grows opportunity will be provided for additional colleges and universities to become sponsoring members of the AUFS and thus participants in the full service.

Sponsoring member institutions pay the equivalent of an associate professor's salary annually toward the operating costs of the AUFS program. To this income has been added a generous grant from the Ford Foundation. Receipts from supporting subscriptions will make possible further growth and broader service.

ORIGINS

The AUFS is the outgrowth of more than 25 years' experience accumulated by the Institute of Current World Affairs in financing and guiding the studies of selected young persons aspiring to thoroughgoing familiarity with significant foreign areas. The Institute was endowed by the late Charles R. Crane and has been directed from its inception by Walter S. Rogers.

The Institute and the AUFS are corporately separate, but the Institute, as a training organization, will continue to be one source of recruitment of qualified personnel for the AUFS.

The experience of the Institute gave the founders of the AUFS a base from which to project their plan for a professional organization of scholarly correspondents--in effect, a foreign service operated by and on behalf of American education.

PURPOSES
of the
AMERICAN UNIVERSITIES FIELD STAFF

To develop, finance and direct a corps of men to study mainly at first hand the contemporaneous affairs of significant areas of the world and, through reports and their personal services, to make their knowledge available primarily to universities, colleges, and other educational institutions with a view to aiding the American educational system in the diffusion of knowledge necessary to a better understanding of world conditions;

To make the findings of members of the corps available also through publication and otherwise, to the American people generally, and to publish reports and render services in connection with the purposes of the Corporation;

To encourage the members of the corps and others to develop improved techniques for the study of significant areas of the world and for the dissemination of knowledge with regard to such areas.

AMERICAN
FIELD STAFF
522 FIFTH AVENUE NEW YORK 36, N.Y.

The attached letter is one of a continuing series from AMERICAN UNIVERSITIES FIELD STAFF correspondents on current developments in world affairs.

This correspondence is distributed by the AUFS as a contribution to the American fund of information on significant foreign events, trends and personalities. The informal letters, reflecting the current judgments of men on the scene, are of primary interest to the universities and colleges which cooperatively sponsor the AUFS, a nonprofit corporation.

The letters are available by arrangement to other educational institutions, business and publishing firms, and public affairs groups interested in the findings of exceptionally qualified correspondents. The writers have been chosen for their ability to use scholarly as well as journalistic skills in collecting, reporting and evaluating data. Each has resided in his area of assignment long enough to be thoroughly at home in it, and has combined personal observation and experience with advanced studies.

The letters are copyrighted and must not be reproduced or republished in whole or in part, or given secondary distribution, except by arrangement with the AUFS. Faculty members of colleges and universities receiving the AUFS services are privileged to use the letters in classroom work, and students of these institutions may draw on the material in them for academic papers not planned for publication.

Letters and reports issued by the AMERICAN UNIVERSITIES FIELD STAFF are not selected to accord with an editorial policy and do not represent the views of its membership. Responsibility for accuracy of facts and for opinions expressed in the letters and reports rests solely with the individual correspondents.

A. DOAK BARNETT was born in Shanghai, the son of an American YMCA official, and spent his first fifteen years in China. He was graduated by Yale University in 1942 with the rating of Philosophical Orations (summa cum laude). After wartime service as a Marine Corps officer in the United States and in the Pacific islands, he returned to Yale and took an M. A. in international relations, with honors. In 1947 he returned to China as an associate of the Institute of Current World Affairs. His field studies brought him into contact with the political, social, and economic issues of postwar China. During 1948–49 he observed the communist military siege and take-over of Peking and studied communist propaganda, policies, and actions on the spot. After a period with the U. S. Government both in Washington and Hong Kong, he joined the AUFS in 1952. He participated in the AUFS program of visits to member universities in 1952–53, and then returned to the Far East. His base for several months was Hong Kong. He then moved to Singapore to observe and report on developments in Southeast Asia. Mr. Barnett is the author of "Profile of Red China," Foreign Policy Report, February 1950, and of "Mass Political Organizations in Communist China," The Annals of the American Academy of Political and Social Science, September 1951. He has also written numerous articles for the Chicago Daily News Foreign Service.

IMPRISONMENT OF THE MIND

The Effects of Indoctrination in Jail upon Two Young Americans Who Have Just Been Released by the Chinese Communists

A Report from A. Doak Barnett

69-B Robinson Road
Hong Kong
March 24, 1955

Hong Kong rests on the edge of two worlds. But sometimes you forget it, because the place is so calm, beautiful, and "normal." Then, unexpectedly, something happens which shakes you emotionally and intellectually, making you realize that the frail wire fence separating Hong Kong from Communist China symbolizes a chasm which is frighteningly wide and deep in many respects.

On February 28, a friend of mine told me that I looked pale. I have no doubt that I did. During the previous twenty-four hours I underwent an experience which was genuinely unnerving. I saw and talked with two young Americans who had just emerged from Communist China after serving three-and-a-half-year "sentences" for "espionage." Both were completely indoctrinated in the ideology and world outlook of their communist jailers.

When Mrs. Adele Rickett and Malcolm Bersohn arrived in Hong Kong on February 27, instead of being jubilant about their release or resentful against the Peking regime under which they were imprisoned, they immediately made it clear to the world that they had become dedicated supporters and enthusiastic missionaries for the communist cause. Both of them flabbergasted friends and reporters who met their train by openly confessing complete guilt as "spies," expressing deep "shame and remorse" for all of their past "crimes against the Chinese people," praising communism and the Peking regime extravagantly, and announcing that in the future they planned to "work for the people."

Mrs. Rickett and Bersohn seemed to be under some sort of spell even after crossing the border. As they talked to reporters, the words came flowing out in the clichés and vocabulary of Radio Peking; it was as if they were repeating a communist catechism rather than describing personal experiences. The whole performance seemed unreal, even though both Mrs. Rickett and Bersohn spoke with obvious conviction. As I listened to them, the dominant thought which kept running through my head was that their bodies had been freed from jail but that their minds were still imprisoned by the narrow dogmas to which, amazingly, they had been converted while behind bars. They were still living in a world created in their minds by years of indoctrination and psychological pressures in prison.

Both Mrs. Rickett and Bersohn came out of China hypnotized by the communists' "truths," which they learned not by personal observation or reasoning but by instruction in jail. In conversations they spoke constantly of the "truth." What a short and simple word! Webster says that it means "conformity to fact and reality." Simple enough, in theory. But Mrs. Rickett and Bersohn seem to have lost or abandoned their own capacity to make independent judgments on "facts" and "realities" and to have accepted completely the "truths" propagated within prison walls in Peking.

These two young Americans are the most striking examples to date of foreigners successfully indoctrinated within Communist China's jails. They are disturbing testimony of the vulnerability of the human mind to psychological pressures, and striking proof of the effectiveness of Chinese Communist indoctrination methods.

* * * * *

Malcolm Bersohn, age twenty-nine, comes from New York City, where his father, a lawyer, lives on Park Avenue. He is a tall, lanky person who looks younger than his years.

Bersohn received his university education at Harvard, where he studied biology. After being graduated in 1944 he joined the army, and in the following year he was sent to China. For the next year or so, he says, he worked for the Office of Strategic Services, one of the leading wartime U.S. intelligence agencies, before being demobilized and sent home in 1946.

More study in the U.S. followed, but apparently the lure of the Orient infected Bersohn as it did many of his fellow GI's during the war. By 1948 he was back in China, this time studying to be a doctor at Peking Union Medical College, the Rockefeller-endowed institution which used to give the finest medical training in China.

In early 1949 the communists entered Peking. At first Bersohn, like most other foreigners who had not evacuated the city, continued his work undisturbed.

I was in Peking at the time, and although I did not know Bersohn personally, I heard others talk about him. He was one of the sort who "settle in" abroad, learn the language, live very much as local inhabitants do, and avoid involvement in the somewhat ingrown community life of their fellow countrymen's enclaves. He was immersed in Peking. A few of the Americans there who knew Bersohn regarded him as "emotionally immature," but people gave him credit for "really trying to learn about China."

Finally, in July of 1951, Bersohn was arrested, along with a number of other Americans, and disappeared into a Chinese Communist jail. From that time until last month little was heard of him. Peking made no public mention of his name, and no charges against him were aired.

A few reports about him did trickle out to Hong Kong, however, from fellow prisoners and other Americans released earlier. These reports indicated that he was a recalcitrant prisoner who for a long time stood up to his jailers and consequently received tough treatment from them. During the early period of his imprisonment he was seen in chains; later he was observed manacled with handcuffs.

Mrs. Adele Rickett is thirty-five. Her family home in the U.S. is in Yonkers, N.Y.; but for a number of years both she and her husband have been studying China professionally. During the war her husband worked for the Office of Naval Intelligence, and after the war both of them did graduate work in Chinese studies at the University of Pennsylvania. She received an M.A. there in early 1948.

In late 1948, the Ricketts went to China. They received Fulbright scholarships to continue their study of China and chose Peking as a place to settle down. When the communists took over in 1949, "Del" was working toward a Ph.D. in Chinese literature and teaching English at Tsinghua University on a part-time basis.

As in the case of Bersohn, the strong arm of the Chinese Communist regime descended suddenly in July 1951. Mr. Rickett was arrested and sent to jail. Mrs. Rickett was placed under strict house arrest for over a year, and then she too was taken off to jail. There she was able to write notes to her husband, but she was never allowed to see him. No charges against either of them were publicly announced when they were arrested.

During 1949, in the period immediately after the communist entry into Peking, I saw something of the Ricketts and got to know them fairly well. "Del" impressed me as a highly intelligent, stable American girl whose interests seemed to be more cultural than political. Like most Americans with her kind of educational background, however, she did, of course, have political views. They impressed me as being mildly New Dealish and "liberal" but in no sense pro-Communist. She was, in short, neither radical nor ultraconservative but somewhere in the middle.

Mrs. Rickett was in a basic sense religious, I believe, although she was not a proponent of dogma and did not parade her religious beliefs very much in public. Her personality was one exhibiting quiet self-confidence, friendliness, and warmth. She was the kind of girl one calls attractive even though she was not really pretty.

* * * * *

There was no forewarning of the release of Mrs. Rickett and Bersohn, just as there had been none of their arrest. Suddenly, on Sunday, February 27, they presented themselves to the police at the Hong Kong border.

Hasty telephone calls from the American Consulate-General notified a handful of reporters and friends of their arrival and, by the time the afternoon train from the international border to Kowloon station had arrived, there were about a dozen people waiting for them at the station.

When the two of them stepped off the train, it was obvious that they were tired and tense, but neither looked in bad shape. From a sartorial point of view, they were hardly impressive; Bersohn was wearing faded blue jeans and an old gray shirt, while Mrs. Rickett had on black slacks and a checked jacket. But it was clear that physically they were all right, sound of limb and not emaciated. Their friends heaved a sigh of relief, and the reporters took note of their condition.

Fifteen minutes later, friends and reporters alike were exchanging questioning glances, shaking their heads in amazement and looking bewildered. We were assembled in a small station teashop interviewing the two of them, and what we heard was unbelievable.

The first question was directed at Bersohn. It was a general question which asked, in effect, "Well, what has happened to you during the last three and a half years?" Very simple, he said, "I was a spy." From then on his words tumbled over each other as he volubly described his guilt, his shame, the justification for his arrest, the good treatment he received in jail, his admiration for the communists, and his support of all the Peking regime's domestic and foreign policies. He spoke rapidly, somewhat nervously, and with considerable emotion. When questions from his listeners showed doubt or skepticism, he argued heatedly to convince the questioner. He sounded like a spokesman for the Chinese Communist regime rather than an American who had just been released from a Chinese Communist jail.

All of the reporters present scribbled furiously. This was turning out, unexpectedly, to be quite a story. No American expelled from China before had talked quite this way. Some had been strongly influenced by indoctrination in jail; many, for example, had believed propaganda such as the germ warfare charges, or were impressed in general by the strength and dynamism of the Chinese Communist regime. But none had turned out to be 100-per-cent partisans and apologists for the communists.

Mrs. Rickett sat calmly on the side lines while Bersohn held the limelight, but finally the interview was switched to her. When she was asked, "And Mrs. Rickett, what comment would you like to make on the things Mr. Bersohn has told us?" I am sure that almost everyone present expected her to disagree with what had been said. Her first remark, therefore, was stunning. "I absolutely echo his statements," she said. Then she proceeded, in her own quiet way, to add a good deal more.

The interview broke up with everyone in a strange mood. Mrs. Rickett declined an invitation to stay with an American couple who had been close friends of hers in Peking; she chose instead to take a room in the YWCA. Bersohn went to the YMCA.

I decided that I must have an opportunity to talk with them again, this time alone, so the next morning I telephoned "Del" at the YWCA. She was friendly; "certainly, come on over." When I arrived, Bersohn had already joined her, so I sat down with the two of them in a sun-washed YWCA lounge. We talked for a couple of hours. Their answers to my questions were like a conversational fugue, the parts neat, regular and intertwining, the themes consistent and familiar. It was no act, however; I was absolutely convinced of their sincerity. By the time I left, I had the feeling that a vague chill had settled over the sunny YWCA lounge.

* * * * *

It is difficult to describe impressions of people's minds, because such impressions are formed not only from what the people say but also on the basis of how they say it. However, I know of no better way of giving a thumbnail sketch of the present state of mind of Mrs. Rickett and Bersohn than simply to quote some of the things they said to me. I cannot attempt to reproduce full conversations, but even disjointed fragments may give a rough idea of their thinking.

All of the following quotes were taken down verbatim in their presence, and they were spoken with what appeared to me to be firm conviction.

GUILT AND SHAME

The question of espionage charges and guilt came up first. Both Mrs. Rickett and Bersohn were determined to prove their own guilt.

Bersohn: "When I was arrested I was absolutely guilty of the crime of espionage."

Rickett: "My situation was clearly espionage."

Bersohn: "I knew in the first place that I was guilty. In order to gain self-respect one has to confess."

Rickett: "Before I was arrested, in my heart I knew that I was guilty of being a spy, but I wouldn't have admitted it."

Bersohn: "We are grateful for such light sentences. One has to be penitent to be released."

What did their "espionage" consist of?

Bersohn said that as a member of the OSS during the war he "did intelligence and espionage against the Chinese revolution." Then, he said, when he was in Peking as a medical student during the period of the communist take-over, he "did another piece of espionage" when he "sneaked through" the "wave length of a spy radio" to an American university lecturer outside of Peking who, Bersohn says, was a "spy" and "not a friend of the Chinese people." In addition, he said that he delivered information on the "Chinese Volunteer Army" to an American girl in Peking; this girl, a student, was also a "spy," according to Bersohn. In short, he said, "I admit I spied for the U.S. Government. It is a fact. How can I deny a fact?" Bersohn then went on to say that previously he had had a "savage mentality" and "did not know" what he was doing. Later, he said, he had come to feel "full of shame and remorse."

Mrs. Rickett stated that her husband worked for the ONI, and that she "helped him in doing espionage work." This, she said, consisted of "military, cultural, and political intelligence work." She asserted that she and her husband each received $2,300 from the U.S. Government in 1948, and that he received another $3,000 in 1950. "In the beginning," she added, "I was terribly reactionary, refusing to see what the truth was."

On the surface, these confessions, from the "criminals" involved, may sound fairly convincing. Yet I know of no one who talked with Mrs. Rickett and Bersohn in Hong Kong who was convinced. The two of them found themselves in the anomalous position of confessing their guilt to people who did not believe them.

I personally am convinced that neither Mrs. Rickett nor Bersohn was guilty of "espionage" as the term is used in the West. I asked Bersohn if he had ever, in Peking, submitted regular reports to any agency of the U.S. Government or received any money for information. The question annoyed him, and his answer was evasive. "Espionage has nothing to do with money," he said. I probed Mrs. Rickett on the source of the money she said came from the U.S. Government. Reluctantly, she admitted that the $2,300 she and her husband received in 1948 consisted of their Fulbright scholarship grants, and she avoided saying anything about the $3,000 which her husband received in 1950 by stating, "That is his affair, and I cannot say anything about it."

But both Mrs. Rickett and Bersohn left China convinced that they were guilty of "espionage," as the term is used by the communists. In short, they apparently came to accept the Chinese Communists' definition of the word, which can be extended to cover acquisition of almost any knowledge about the regime, particularly by persons unsympathetic to the communists.

Some news reports from the U.S. following Mrs. Rickett's release implied that she might be trying to protect her husband, who is still in jail in Peking. But I am sure in my own mind that this was not the case. She appeared to be sincerely convinced of her own guilt and, like Bersohn, was "full of shame and remorse." She was able to say to me, without emotion, that she was not concerned about her husband, and that naturally he would have to be in jail longer than she was "because his crime was greater than mine."

INFALLIBLE LAW

From the day they were arrested until shortly before their release, neither Mrs. Rickett nor Bersohn was given a trial or convicted of any crime. Then, about two weeks before they left, they were both "tried," sentenced to three and one-half years' imprisonment and "deported" from China "because they had already served their terms." In view of these facts, their opinions on the present legal system in Communist China are startling, to say the least. Remember, also, that Bersohn is the son of a successful New York lawyer.

Rickett: "In China today a person who is not guilty of a crime could never be arrested or convicted."

Bersohn: "I was together with several hundred people at different times in jail. I never knew anyone who was not guilty of serious crimes. I never met one innocent person."

Rickett: "They don't arrest you until they have absolute proof that you are guilty."

Bersohn: "The legal system in the People's Democracies is the most infallible system on earth. Why? It is democracy. Anyone who thinks that anybody else has made a mistake or is capable of making a mistake can express himself on it. That is the essence of democracy."

I asked them if they did not think it strange that their "trials" came at the end rather than at the beginning of their imprisonment. Of course not, they replied. They were guilty from the start. The authorities make no mistakes. The system is infallible.

JAIL: "WONDERFUL"

Bersohn spent a total of three and one-half years in jail in Peking, and, as stated earlier, he was reliably reported to have been in chains or handcuffs during at least the earlier part of that period. Mrs. Rickett spent two and one-half years of her "sentence" in jail.

There have been many reports on conditions within Peking jails, including theirs, made by persons who have come out of China during recent years. These reports indicate that treatment of different individuals varies considerably. In some cases, the authorities are fairly lenient in a physical sense, and the emphasis is on indoctrination. In others, however, the jailers are very rough, and sometimes prisoners undergo prolonged periods of physical maltreatment. Most foreign inmates seem to get enough food to survive without difficulty, but the diet is meager. The cells are usually overcrowded, and prison life is extremely austere. Many prisoners are made to work. All prisoners live in an atmosphere of psychological harassment, pressure, and fear while they undergo intensive indoctrination and demands for confessions.

What did Mrs. Rickett and Bersohn have to say about their treatment in jail?

Bersohn: "I was always treated kindly while in jail. Everyone was--not only Americans but also Chinese. I had pneumonia once and almost died. The doctors treated me day and night."

Rickett: "The food was good."

Bersohn: "The Chinese Government gave me two lives. I should have been shot for espionage and wasn't. I might have died of pneumonia in prison and didn't. I am certainly grateful to the Chinese people."

Rickett: "Our conditions were so good! The People's Government took care of us so well!"

There was no irony in these statements. They were made with genuine emotion.

One of the most significant things about their discussion of jail life was the fact that they refused to talk at all about their indoctrination. They refused, in fact, to recognize that the "study" and "discussion" groups in which they participated were instruments of indoctrination. The whole process, they asserted, was a voluntary one in which they gradually came to see the errors of their past and accepted "truth."

Rickett: "In jail I sometimes studied and sometimes worked, at sewing and such. The study was often in groups, sometimes individual. But don't think it was forced. Usually, the demand for study came from me. It was not placed on me by the government."

Bersohn: "We could discuss anything we wanted in jail. It was free discussion."

Rickett: "We had no pressure put on us."

As I listened to them make claims such as these, I thought of all the people who previously had described to me the severe psychological pressures of prison indoctrination which they had experienced. I wondered how and when Mrs. Rickett and Bersohn had been "broken." But it did not surpirse me that they could not admit, even to themselves, that their ideological conversion had been under duress.

When Bersohn was asked about reports that he had been kept in chains, he became agitated and said he would not answer such questions.

"THE TRUTH"

Everything which Mrs. Rickett and Bersohn said provided evidence that in their Peking jail they had undergone a basic emotional and intellectual conversion, and that they left China believing with religious fervor in communist "truth."

Rickett: "In a People's Democracy, after you express your opinion, through the course of discussion you arrive at the truth. There is only one truth. There is only one standard for judgment: what is good for the most people."

Bersohn: "Everything we read in the newspapers told the truth. The newspapers in China cannot tell a lie. No, we did not see any papers but the Peking People's Daily, but it tells the truth. It is not distorted like American papers."

Rickett: "When I first went into jail, I argued for American democracy. We had many happy discussions. But gradually I realized that I was looking at things from the wrong viewpoint, through the wrong glasses. Gradually, one comes to realize the truth."

Bersohn summed it up neatly when he said: "A cigarette is a cigarette, a piano is a piano, and truth is truth." How can one question it? There it is--simple, clear, undebatable.

What had happened to the innate skepticism, the insistence on personal opinions and individual judgments, the belief in independent thinking which these two graduates of leading American universities must once have held? Wholehearted belief in "the one truth" has superseded all.

"NEW DEMOCRACY"

After hearing Mrs. Rickett and Bersohn speak the way they did of the "truth," there were no surprises when I heard them express their political views.

Rickett: "In the New Democracy today the government is of the people. It comes from the people."

Bersohn: "If Lincoln were alive today he would be a communist."

Rickett: "The Communist Party is an organization of the people. Anyone who wants to work for the people can join the Party. The people and the Communist Party are one."

Bersohn: "It would be perfectly impossible to have democracy without the leadership of the Communist Party."

Rickett: "There is absolutely nothing you can say to express the new spirit you see in China. Many of the principles of morality in Christianity are absolutely akin to the principles practiced in People's China."

Bersohn: "In the whole world there is nobody so peaceful as the Chinese government and Chinese people."

Rickett: "The communists are always against aggressive war."

Bersohn: "The United States is filled with poverty at the present time and is on the road to war. Depression is inevitable in the U.S. It cannot be avoided. Periodic depression is part of the system."

Rickett: "Capitalism is inseparable from poverty and war."

Bersohn: "I am sure that the future standard of living of the Chinese people, after they have completed their socialist industrialization, will be much higher than the standard of living in any capitalist country."

Rickett: "In the future, America will be a socialist country. It is not a question of whether the U.S. 'should' copy the U.S.S.R. and People's China. It is a question of whether the U.S. 'will.' It absolutely will; that is the way the whole world is inevitably going."

Bersohn: "Taiwan [Formosa] belongs to the Chinese people and does not belong to the U.S. No evil force can stop them."

Rickett: "No force on earth can stop the Chinese people when they want to get what is rightfully theirs."

The whole schematized communist conception of the world, phrased in standard terminology, was repeated over and over. If there had not been such conviction in their manner of speaking, their contribution to the conversation would have sounded like the reading of a well-rehearsed, two-part script. One of the pair would make a statement; the other would affirm support for it and then, using the same terminology, add something in the way of elaboration. The first would then pick up a cue and continue. And so on. Their answers to questions were not short and simple. They had to answer every question with the complete version of the catechism; and even if interrupted they would insist on continuing to speak their piece.

One very revealing incident took place while we were talking in the lounge of the YWCA. An American woman who had joined our conversation noticed that Bersohn was not wearing socks and asked him why. He was flustered by the question and said, "I am sorry. Yes, I should be wearing socks, shouldn't I? I will get some." He was like a small boy reacting to a verbal spanking. I wondered how many, and how harsh, his verbal thrashings had been during the past three and a half years in jail, and whether he would ever be able to stand on his own feet again as an independent person, intellectually and emotionally.

"I AM NOT WORTHY"

The shock of listening to them expressing communist dogma would have been less if Mrs. Rickett and Bersohn had become members of the Communist Party. When a person joins the international apparatus of communist organization, a great many things follow from this fact. But this was not the case with them. Both stated that they had not become Party members--they seemed genuinely surprised when asked if they had--and in my opinion there is no reason to doubt their claims. They are ideological converts, not political recruits.

When Bersohn was asked if he had joined the Communist Party, he replied, "I have not that honor."

Mrs. Rickett answered the same question by saying, "How can we join the Communist Party? Only the best people can join the Communist Party. I am not worthy. I have committed crimes."

Both of them, however, feel in a vague, undefined way a tremendous obligation to work for the communist cause, for the new "truth" they have accepted.

Mrs. Rickett, when asked of her future plans, said, "I want to return to the U.S. to be an honest person, work for the people, and make up in some way for the harm I have done in the past."

Bersohn said, "I will try to be an honest and upright person, a person who does not harm the people. I will try to apply the morality the communists taught me--you must not harm the people."

* * * * *

My principal emotions after talking with "Del" Rickett and Bersohn were pity and shock. I believe this was true also of most others who talked with them here in Hong Kong. There were very few angry reactions.

My pity was based upon realization of the terrible emotional stress they must have undergone during indoctrination in jail, and apprehension about the difficulty they will have in adjusting to a world in which the "facts," "realities," and "truths" they now accept will be in constant conflict not only with attitudes they will encounter but also with the things they themselves will observe and experience. They have traveled a hard road psychologically during the past three and a half years; another difficult road lies ahead.

My shock came from seeing what had been done under pressure to the mind of a person I knew. After talking with "Del" Rickett I had the sinking feeling that "if it could happen to her, it could happen to almost anyone I know." The Chinese Communists' methods of indoctrination are not basically esoteric or mysterious. Essentially the technique is to control all that a person sees and hears, as well as to focus on him the full force of authority and social pressure, and to use both persuasion and threat to make a person confess past guilt, renounce previous attitudes, and wholly accept a new faith. (See ADB-3-'54.)

Of course, my conversations with Mrs. Rickett and Bersohn took place only during the first days after they left Communist China, so it is difficult to judge to what extent they will be able slowly to come out of their present trancelike state of mind and adjust to a new environment during the months ahead. Their indoctrination may, or may not, wear off.

But certainly when I talked with them immediately after their release, both Mrs. Rickett and Bersohn were living in a world far different from the one I know on this side of the flimsy wire fence separating Hong Kong from Communist China.

Dear Mr. Murrow:

Confirming my conversation with Miss Holder, we plan to include the photographs of leading CBS TV and radio personalities in a setting for a CBS-Columbia filmed TV spot. We should like very much to include your photograph in this group.

This spot shows Quentin Reynolds at a desk in a man's study. While the camera follows Mr. Reynolds from his desk to a television set, the camera quickly pans over the photographs on the wall in the background. The camera will not rest on any one photograph; in other words, it will be more of a group shot. The commercial message does not refer to the photographs. There is no endorsement involved, direct or implied.

If you have no objection to our using your photograph in this setting, would you kindly confirm your approval on one copy of this letter. 11x14 photographs will be used. If you would like a specific photo used, kindly advise us. Otherwise, the 11x14 photo will be ordered by us from the CBS Photo Department.

This spot is scheduled for the CBS O&O stations.

Thank you very much for your kind consideration.

Sincerely,

Ruth Erikson

Dear Mr Murrow,

Your job in pursuit of decency is putting heart into all of us, and I am deeply grateful. Your happy combination of medium, temperament, brains and convictions is badly needed.

I should like to offer a suggestion for a further program that would nicely complement your previous ones. In the Annie Lee Moss story, you stirred up our ready emotions of fight for the underdog. In the Bishop Sheil program, the fight was moved very effectively up to the levels of significance and values. We are now ready, I think for a welcome shot of critical thinking so we can spot McCarthy's tactics and reply to them rather than merely feeling angry or disapproving of them. Hence my suggestion: Take a look at Stuart Chase's chapter on "McCarthyism"in his new book, Power of Words. (Chapter 21, "Guilt by Association", pgs 224-235) Here Chase exposes the various types of fallacy habitually used by McCarthy. So how about this--to run 15 or 20 minutes:

a. Get Chase to characterize, using blackboard, one device of faulty thinking (e.g. missing dates), and give a couple of homely examples so we see what the device is.

b. Then put on an ex~~cerpt~~ excerpt from McCarthy in which he is very clearly using this device

c. Then back to Chase with another device of faulty thinking

d. And back to McCarthy using this device.

etc.

I really think that letting McCarthy illustrate 6 different and obvious fallacies in thinking would be instructive to a lot of people. It would have strong impact (in view of your previous programs) because it would give even the most humble and cowed person grounds for resisting the senator. And it would give those who hesitate to attack McCarthy-even though they sense his unfairness-- a set of demonstrable clear-cut criteria which they can apply for themselves to form their own judgments on non-ideological and non-controversial grounds.

You could call the program a book review or a report on semantics.

Cordially, and with best wishes,

Herbert A Thelen

P S. May I offer two specific criticisms? (still trying to be helpful)

1. Please stop trying to imply that McCarthy's doings are unimportant or"not vital". This is ineffective use of ridicule, and you don't believe it anyway. Joe versus Murrow et.al. symbolizes (as you have pointed out) extremely grave issues, and our need as a nation to clarify these issues once more seems perfectly reasonable in light of the confusions of our times. What McCarthy does may not be important per se, but how we react to what he does is crucial.

2. Through repetetion, the phrase "Junior senator from Wisconsin" has lost its original delicately derisive flavor. Can you find another?

Dear Ed,

On my round the globe jaunt I had expected to find a spare moment in which to write you about that Friday show. But between a wife, an assistant, two camera crews, seeing endless officials and others, taking part in Cinerama episodes, doing a stream of recordings, and so on, I never got around to it, and where I am right back where I started.

I congratulate you on the fabulous success you've made of that simple little three-man enterprise you have on Friday night. The following Monday in a luggage shop within five minutes a dozen people had spoken to me about it. Even in far countries, we kept constantly running into people who spoke about it. So, I can see why people are said to be standing in line to get in the act. Thanks a lot for elbowing 'em aside, just to put on one of your neighbors. Incidentally, if you'd ever like a change of pace for one night nothing would please me more than to give you your own treatment -- from Glen Arden.

I'm glad to hear you were able to spend a couple of nights in the country during the holidays. Wish you would use my place more often.

Incidentally, I wore Fran out completely on this latest junket. She decided that Honolulu was as near home as she could get at this time. I felt the same, but, Simon

You asked me to send you my report on Barbados, a copy of which is enclosed. If you wish additional information about the island for the television program you are planning next spring, I will be happy to make available other reports and material I brought back with me.

The experience was most exciting and challenging. The Barbadians are intelligent, friendly, and hospitable and I was fortunate to have had the privilege of knowing and working with them. For me, the trip was successful as steps are being taken to initiate a family planning program. The Governor spoke of the great need for such a program in his address at the reopening of the Legislature in September, not as the sole solution to all of the problems facing Barbados but as one of the methods to be used in dealing with a difficult economic situation. It was heartening to have had such a positive response from the people themselves to the idea and need for planned parenthood.

Warm personal regards to you, Mrs. Murrow and Casey and best wishes for the Thanksgiving holiday.

Regret

My dear Mr. Murrow:-

I phoned, and your Miss Glazer and Miss McDowery were very kind.

Is there any way that, by appointment, I could have a fifteen minute interview with you?

The matter pertains to a group of Patents, turned to the "Government" in the last war, and others, in World War I. It has become evident, to the writer, that perhaps publicity, as in the case of the reinstated air force officer, which you aided and effected, may be justified for me.

Without my carrying the data to Beverly Smith, he of the "Bal. Eve Post" stated it was the "outstanding case of corporate abuse ever brought to his attention".

Sawyers and powerful people appear to wish to block this documented matter from American Public Knowledge.

You might choose to consider, and perhaps aid - I am sincere - again if you might not wish, to yourself, become involved - however is an interview possible?

Sincerely
Wilfred Thomas

Dear Mr. Murrow:

I am pleased to know that you are interested in my bill to establish an Advisory Committee on Cultural Interchange within the Department of State, and I deeply appreciate your letter of the 20th.

This is not a new proposal. Dr. R. H. Fitzgerald, Chancellor of the University of Pittsburgh, and Chairman of the United States Advisory Commission on Educational Exchange of the State Deparment, said in a letter which he wrote to me on October 10th that such a commission was of vital concern to his commission and one upon which recommendations have been made to the Congress since 1951. It is my hope that with the new concern for cultural interchange expressed at the Geneva conferences that this legislation will finally be enacted into law.

I would be glad to see you either in Washington or New York if you wish, or in Trenton, regarding my proposal at a time that would be mutually agreeable. In the meantime, I hope that you will be able to testify on my bill when hearings are resumed.

Cordially,

Frank Thompson, Jr.

P.S. You may be interested in the N. Y. Times account of my proposal which appeared in that newspaper on October 24th (copy enclosed).

Rep. Joe Holt and Rep. John J. Rhodes are Members of the Subcommittee with me which is considering my bill. They have just returned from Europe and have urged an expanded program of cultural interchange.

U. S. WILL STEP UP CULTURE PROGRAM

Planning Aims at Broader Exchange or a 'Soft War,' Depending on Geneva

By DANA ADAMS SCHMIDT
Special to The New York Times.

WASHINGTON, Oct. 23—Legislation for cultural "competitive coexistence" is being prepared in cooperation with officials of the State and Commerce Departments and the United States Information Agency.

The legislation is designed to create an organization with resources to expand East-West cultural exchanges or to conduct what some officials call a cultural "soft war." The emphasis will depend whether the "Geneva spirit" develops or fades as a result of the new foreign ministers' conference.

These objectives would be served by expanding and making permanent the President's Emergency Fund for cultural exchange. Congress voted $5,000,000 for the fund at President Eisenhower's request in 1954 and again in 1955. It subsidizes visits to foreign countries by outstanding United States cultural representatives and finances this country's participation in international trade fairs.

Tours Made Possible

The fund has made possible such tours as those of the folk opera "Porgy and Bess" to the Mediterranean and Latin America and the Symphony of the Air to the Far East. Both were successful. Individual artists also have been assisted in appearances abroad.

But the fund's resources do not begin to equal what the Soviet Union devotes to cultural representation. They would be inadequate if exchanges with the Soviet bloc were added to the program.

Representative Frank Thompson Jr., Democrat of New Jersey, is working on the plan with the executive departments concerned. He is revising a bill he introduced last June whose main purposes are:

¶To promote international cultural exchanges by means of a permanent fund.

¶To set up an advisory commission through which private organizations would participate in planning cultural exchanges. This could become a strategy board in the cultural "soft war."

¶To establish a civilian award by which the Government could recognize and encourage outstanding cultural achievements.

Senators at Work

Senator James E. Murray, Democrat of Montana, is working on a companion measure in the Senate. Senators H. Alexander Smith, Republican of New Jersey, and Karl E. Mundt, Republican of South Dakota, propose to achieve similar objectives by creating a separate service to handle exchanges in all fields. The present educational exchange service of the State Department is based on the Smith-Mundt Act of 1948.

Representative Thompson, meanwhile, has begun a study of postal regulations and practices that have led to complaints that Soviet publications often do not reach the persons to whom they are addressed.

Abe McGregor, aide to the Postmaster General recently wrote Mr. Thompson that "so far as the Post Office Department and the Customs Service are concerned, copies of Izvestia and Pravda arriving in this country are going to subscribers thereof." These are the two principal Soviet newspapers.

However, Mr. McGregor added that "magazines, booklets, etc., which are sent over soley for the purpose of influencing the recipients in favor of Soviet policies and actions and against the United States" were treated as "non-mailable" in line with a 1940 opinion by the Attorney General.

A letter written Oct. 4 by David W. Kendall, Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, informed Mr. Thompson further that there had been no delays in the delivery of Soviet publications "within knowledge."

The letter explained:

"As you know, all imported goods, including publications, are subject to examination to determine their admissibility into the country. Imported publications containing political propaganda are also subject to the provisions of the Foreign Agents Registration Act of 1938, as amended, as well as other statutes barring treasonable, insurrectionary, obscene and other matters."

ECONOMIC AID RISES; TREND IS REVERSED

Special to The New York Times.

WASHINGTON, Oct. 23—Economic grants to foreign countries rose sharply in the last fiscal year, reversing a five-year downward trend, the Commerce Department reported today.

Over-all foreign aid declined by $760,000,000 because of the continued drop in military help. This form of aid, largely equipment, has fallen from $4,500,000,000 in 1953 to $2,500,000,000.

However, economic aid totaled $1,944,000,000, compared with $1,586,000,000 in the 1954 fiscal year. The big items of increase were cash grants to France, which are now ending, to pay for the Indochina war, and grants in the Asian and Pacific areas.

Indochina, which got substantial direct aid besides that coming from France, and South Korea were by far the biggest recipients in the Asian area.

The "momentum" of previous programs continued to pump substantial funds into European countries such as Britain and Italy. But this aid is rapidly tapering off. Only Turkey, Greece, Spain and Yugoslavia are expected to get new grants in the current fiscal year.

This year Congress appropriated more new funds for economic development in Asia than ever before.

'CONTROLLED' BINGO FAVORED BY SILVER

District Attorney Edward S. Silver, of Kings County, went on record yesterday in favor of bingo games for the benefit of religious and charitable organizations.

Interviewed on the "Let's Find Out" radio program over WCBS, the prosecutor said he approved "controlled bingo, the playing of the game without the influence of racketeers."

"If the game is confined only to recognized established religious and charitable groups—where the money taken in goes to the support of these institutions—then I am in favor of it," he said.

The District Attorney again expressed the opinion that "professional elements" had injected themselves "in some way" into bingo game in Brooklyn. He added that he had "valuable information that we are running down."

On juvenile delinquency, Mr. Silver noted that the gang situation had "greatly improved" in the last five years and he gave much of the credit to the Youth Board, whose field workers mingle with the boys.

WILLIAM CURLEY, NEWSMAN, IS DEAD

Editor of Journal-American Was Top Hearst Executive—Joined Chain in 1898

William A. Curley, editor of The New York Journal-American and a top executive in the Hearst newspaper-magazine chain, died yesterday afternoon of a heart ailment in the Harkness Pavilion of the Columbia-Presbyterian Medical Center. He was 81 years old.

Through a lifetime of newspaper work, Mr. Curley followed the "alert - alive - aggressive" school of journalism. His duties took him to posts in San Francisco, Los Angeles, Chicago and New York. Wherever he worked, he was quick to spot a story and always ready to pour his paper's full resources into the task of getting it. In the later years of his life he was rated as a top news executive.

Mr. Curley was born in New York on March 23, 1874. He began his career as an office boy for an advertising agency. As a young man he wrote bicycle news for The New York Recorder until it ceased publication.

Joined Hearst in 1898

He joined the William Randolph Hearst newspapers in 1898 as a sports writer on The New York Journal. Later he became sports editor. He then rose to Sunday editor of The New York American and news editor of that paper, published as a morning newspaper at that time.

Between 1911 and 1913, the newspaper man was managing editor of The Los Angeles Herald. In 1913-14 he held a similar post on The San Francisco Call. He became editor of The Chicago American in 1914 and remained in that post until 1927. During that period gang warfare between Chicago racketeers became commonplace.

During his tenure in Chicago Mr. Curley in 1924 was named supervising editor of The Boston American, The Milwaukee Evening News, The Atlanta Georgian, The Detroit Times, and the Hearst newspapers in Albany, Rochester and Syracuse.

Mr. CMurley summed up his newspaper philosophy in 1925 to a group of advertising men in Chicago. As editor of The Chicago American he reported a gain of 1,000,000 lines of advertising over the 1924 total.

"It is because we are alert, alive and aggressive," he said. "We cater to no creed, but publish the news as we find it."

Transferred to New York

His permanent transfer to New York came in 1927, first as managing editor and then as editor of The Journal. One week before The Journal and The American were merged into The New York Journal-American, he was named editor in chief of the evening paper. Following the merger he was named editor of the paper.

Since 1942, Mr. Curley had been assistant editor in chief of the Hearst Consolidated Publications. He lived for a number of years at the Park Lane Hotel, but more recently in the Warwick. He had a home on Smith Ridge Road in New Canaan, Conn.

On March 3, 1935, Mr. Curley's first wife, Mrs. Mary M. Curley, died in Miami Beach. Two years later he and Miss Mary Grace of Santa Monica, Calif., were married in a civil ceremony at the San Simeon, Calif., ranch of Mr. Hearst.

Surviving also are a son, Robert E. Curley, and a daughter, Mrs. Ethel Mackline, both of Chicago; another daughter, Mrs. Fred Teich of Kenilworth, Ill.; a brother, John, and two sisters, Mrs. Agnes Sullivan and Miss May Curley.

Thomas N. McCarter Sr.

T. N. M'CARTER SR., FOUNDED UTILITY

Former President of Public Service in Jersey Dies—Lawyer, Ex-Legislator

Special to The New York Times.

RUMSON, N. J., Oct. 23—Thomas N. McCarter Sr., who founded and guided the destinies of the huge Pubic Service Corporation of New Jersey for almost half a century, died here today at his estate on Ridge Road. He was 88 years old last Thursday.

Mr. McCarter, a bulky, bluff and active person, was in good health, considering his age, until his death. He remained vigorous and alert, taking an automobile ride almost daily if the weather permitted.

Surviving are his widow, Madeleine; two sons, Thomas Jr., vice president of the Public Service Corporation, and Uzal H. McCarter, manager of the Newark office of Harris-Upham & Co., New York brokerage house, and two daughters, Mrs. Nelson Doubleday of Oyster Bay, L. I., widow of the book publisher, and Mrs. Carlos D. Kelly, president of Carlos Kelly—John Moynahan, a Newark public relations firm.

Abandoned Law Career

Thomas Nesbitt McCarter Sr. abandoned a promising career in the law and politics in 1903, when he was 36 years old, to organize the Public Service Corporation. It became one of the largest utility concerns in the country and its history and his career were inseparable.

He was its president for thirty-six years, then chairman of the board. On Oct. 20, 1945, his seventy-eighth birthday, he retired as chairman.

"From the beginning," Mr. McCarter said on that occasion, "I charged myself with the responsibility of being a trustee to see that the public got fair rates; that our employes were fairly treated; and that our security holders, past and present, should receive a fair return. We have never lowered that banner."

During his presidency and as chairman of the board, Mr. McCarter was the company's spokesman and strategist on many battle fronts in the historic period that witnessed an enormous development of utilities. He was a consistent champion of private ownership of utilities, an unrelenting foe of New Deal policies and, not infrequently, a willing compromiser in bitter disputes.

'Firebrand' of Industry

At a convention of the Edison Electric Institute in 1939, when he was 71 years old and still called the "firebrand" of the public utility industry, Mr. McCarter made a speech typical of the man.

Franklin Roosevelt, he told 2,500 delegates and their guests, had promised him in 1934 that as soon as he balanced the budget he, the President, wanted Mr. McCarter "to come down to Washington" and fix up the utility situation.

"'When I get that thing (the budget) off my hands,'" Mr. McCarter said the President told him, "'Iwant you to come down here, come down here a lot, and you and I will settle this thing all right.'"

A roar of laughter rose from the gathering when Mr. McCarter declared:

"Well, I never heard anything more about it but the reason is perfectly apparent. He hasn't balanced the budget yet!"

Mr. McCarter characterized a Public Service Commission one time as a group of "political horse-thieves." In 1934 he audaciously handed to President Roosevelt a formal memorandum urging him to cooperate with the utility interests in facilitating a Supreme Court decision on the validity of the Tennessee Valley Authority.

"Like you, sir," he said, "I am lawyer-bred."

A few hours later, Frank R. McNinch, chairman of the Federal Power Commission, replied with the caustic retort that "in all the history of the American Government no parallel for such a proposal can be found." It was thought at the time that the President himself might have inspired Mr. McNinch's reply.

But despite Mr. McCarter's vigorous opposition to New Deal legislation, he was quick to recognize the force of these laws and was not averse to invoking them in behalf of his corporation.

Mr. McCarter was born in Newark on Oct. 20, 1867. He received his early education at the Newark Academy and prepared for college at Dr. Pingry's School in Elizabeth. He was graduated from Princeton in the class of '88 and later attended the Columbia University Law School. He gave $250,000 toward the building of a theatre at Princeton, which later was named the McCarter Theatre.

RICHARD PAGET, 86, BRITISH SCIENTIST

Contributor to Growth of Hearing Devices Dies—Was Lawyer, Musician

LONDON, Oct. 23 (Reuters)—Sir Richard Paget, whose research into the problems of sound emanation and reception contributed to the efficiency of anti-submarine devices and hearing aids, died today at his London home. His age was 86.

A barrister, scientist and musician, he made a life-time study of deaf and dumb languages all over the world. Two years ago Sir Richard expounded to missionaries and welfare officers who met at Oxford University a new sign language that he had developed for use in schools for deaf children.

He was endowed with an unusually acute musical ear, which assisted him in his study of sound problems. A skilled musician, he was the composer of several songs. For one, "The Toy Band," Sir Henry Newbolt wrote the words.

Served as an Arbitrator

Sir Richard was also one of the earliest arbitrators in Britain at a time when such methods of dealing with disputes were comparatively rare.

Early in this century he presided over Courts of Arbitration dealing with disputes concerning the Grimsby Fishing Rights and the Metropolitan Water Acts.

Sir Richard was the son of Sir Richard Horner Paget, the first Baronet. He succeeded to the baronetcy on the death of his father in 1908.

Sir Richard was educated at Eton and Magdalen College, Oxford. He was called to the bar in 1895 and became Secretary to the Patent Law Committee in 1900. Through most of World War I—from 1915 to 1918—he was assistant secretary to the Admiralty Board of Invention and Research.

In 1953 he was elected president of the Briitsh Deaf and Dumb Association, a tribute to his work for the deaf and dumb.

Sir Richard was the author of papers contributed to the proceedings of the Royal Society and the Physical Society, to the British Association and to the Encyclopaedia Britannica, on the nature and artificial production of speech and kindred subjects.

Member of Learned Societies

He was an honorary associate of the Royal Institute of British Architects, a fellow of the Institute of Physics, the Physical Society and the Royal Anthropological Institute. He belonged also to the Royal Institution and was an honrary associate member of the Institute of Town Planning.

Sir Richard married twice. His first wife, Lady Muriel Evelyn Vernon Finch-Hatton, only daughter of the twelfth Earl of Winchilsea, died in 1938.

He leaves his second wife, the former Grace Hartley, whom he married in 1939.

Other survivors are the four children of his first marriage, John Starr Paget, who succeeds to the Baronetcy; Lady Chancellor, wife of Sir Christopher Chancellor, general manager of Reuters; Pamela Lady Glenconner, and Lady Debenham.

FOR RELEASE MONDAY, OCTOBER 24, 1955
FROM THE OFFICE OF CONGRESSMAN FRANK THOMPSON, JR.,(D. N. J.)
TRENTON, NEW JERSEY.

On Wednesday I received notice that the Corps of Army Engineers will hold public hearings on November 18th on the subject of the recent hurricanes and floods. The hearings will seek to secure data relative to hurricanes, their frequency and means of forecasting them. Also on the agenda will be proposed flood control measures. I am scheduled to testify, along with many other Members of Congress, public officials and civilians. The hearing will be held in Camden at the Court House.

The disaster to the northeastern states, and the near disaster here last week were more dramatic evidence of the need for immediate flood control measures for the Delaware Valley — if indeed more evidence was necessary. I intend to make the strongest possible plea for suitable flood control measures for the entire Delaware Valley.

A debate of last March 16th in Congress in which I was one of 16 freshmen to take part, has become the main theme of a newly published book entitled "Turning Point Toward Peace". I am most flattered that my remarks on the subject of the Special United Nations Fund for Economic Development (SUNFED) are mentioned prominently by the author, James P. Warburg. The book will be published on November 22nd. I commend it to those of you who believe in constant assessment of this nation's foreign policy.

The subject of the United Nations brings to mind the recent action of the American Legion at its Miami Convention. By a voice vote, without prolonged discussion or consideration of it's former National Commander's Committee Report, the Legion condemned UNESCO, the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization. The former National Commander's report to which I refer was made public recently after a long and comprehensive study by a committee of Legionnaires, the chairman of which was Ray Murphy. The Murphy committee praised UNESCO and recommended that the United States stay in it. UNESCO has long been under fire from many quarters and has always survived with a clean record, but its condemnation by such a great national organization as the American Legion is an alarming thing.

This week Ray Murphy, the National Commander of the Legion some years ago, said that a group of extremists was responsible for the UNESCO action by the Legion and that not 2 percent of the Legion's 3,000,000 members "even claimed to know substantially anything about UNESCO". Murphy, now an attorney in New York, declared that the anti-UNESCO sentiment sprang from a number of "hotbed areas". He listed them as Los Angeles, Houston, Dallas and Gainesville, Florida.

Last Saturday I had office hours at the City Hall in Burlington. It rained so hard that only three excellent swimmers stopped in. I shall be back at the same place on Saturday, October 29th. On the 26th I'll be at Moorestown, at Bordenton on the 27th, at Riverside on the 28th, at Mount Holly on November 5th, and at Marlton on November 12th. Please look for the time in your local newspapers. If the response to my somewhat mobile office hours indicates that the people approve of the action, I shall announce a further schedule at a later date. My feeling is that your representatives should be conveniently available to you.

Young men who desire to compete for appointments to the Naval Academy or West Point should contact either my Trenton or Washington office as soon as possible. On November 14th the Federal Civil Service Commission will conduct a designation examination at my request. Boys interested only in admission to the Air Force Academy need not apply since Air Force nominations at this time amount only to the right to compete in a later examination. Army and Navy nominees will be selected from those who take the Civil Service test.

Dear Sir:

Many thanks for your letter of October 3 and the material you enclosed.

I have read your bill with considerable interest but regret to say that my present crowded schedule does not permit sufficient time at this point for me to make the extensive comment you invite.

However, I shall hope that it will be possible for me to come and see you when next I am in Washington.

Sincerely yours,

The Honorable Frank Thompson, Jr.

Mr. Edward R. Murrow
Columbia Broadcasting System
485 Madison Avenue
New York 22, N. Y.

Dear Mr. Murrow:

In cooperation with the appropriate officials of the United States Information Agency and the Department of State I have been engaged for some weeks in revising my bill, H. R. 6874, on which hearings were held by the Education and Labor Subcommittee of the House of Representatives on July 5 and 6, 1955. Among those who testified on my bill last July were: Nelson Rockefeller, who is in charge of psychological warfare; Samuel Brownell, U. S. Commissioner of Education; Roswell Perkins, Assistant Secretary, U. S. Department of Health, Education and Welfare; and Russell Riley, Director of the International Educational Exchange Service, Department of State.

Hearings are scheduled to be reopened on my measure early in 1956. Title I of my bill is designed to make the President's Emergency Fund for Participation in International Affairs a permanent part of our country's armament in this Cold War period. Titles III and IV are the present Administration's plans for a Federal Advisory Commission on the Arts and for Distinguished Civilian Awards which the President recommended to the Congress in his January 6, 1955, Message on the State of the Union. It is my sincere belief that my plan will, if adopted, make a major contribution to the increased interchange of peoples and ideas -- a subject that will be on the Agenda of the Meeting of the Foreign Ministers late this month.

In commenting on my bill Theodore S. Repplier, President of the Advertising Council, wrote me recently that "the things you recommend have now been so well tested and have proved so helpful to the American cause that I don't see how any informed person can quarrel with them. I wish you all success with this bill."

I would deeply appreciate having your comments on my measure and any suggestions for improving it which you would care to send me.

Cordially,

Frank Thompson, Jr.

tirement system improvements; plugging loopholes in 1954 tax law; increase in minimum wage from 75 cents to $1 per hour; increased penalties for violations of antimonopoly laws; continued renegotiation of Government contracts to eliminate excess profits; bill to provide United States currency with inscription "In God We Trust"; continued accumulation of GI school benefits by servicemen; incentive pay increases and allowances for the Armed Forces; extension of VA direct-loan program; greater control over commodity speculation and manipulation; assistance to States for Salk polio-vaccine program; increased authority for FHA home mortgages; surplus Government material for schools and civil defense; increased penalties for narcotic violations; prohibition on use of mails to transport obscene literature; aid to States for airport construction; and life of Small Business Administration extension.

Voted against exemption of natural gas producers from regulations and the Chicago "water steal" from Lake Michigan.

Unfinished business: The Senate has still to pass legislation, which I voted for in the House, to broaden social security and to provide income tax reductions for low- and middle-income families. The urgently needed highway bill, for which I voted, needs action at the next session. So does other legislation which I favor, but which never reached the floor, such as a liberalized immigration law, aid for school construction, statehood for Hawaii and Alaska, home rule for the District of Columbia, and a new veterans' hospital at Wood.

It Would Be Tragic if the Geneva Conference Caused Us To Slacken Our Information and Cultural Offensive—A Federal Advisory Committee on Cultural Interchange Needed

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANK THOMPSON, JR.

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 2, 1955

Mr. THOMPSON of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, the president of the Advertising Council, a nonprofit organization representing all phases of advertising and dedicated to the uses of advertising in the public service, recently returned to this country after a 6-month study of United States information and propaganda methods in the Orient, the Near East, and Europe under the auspices of the Eisenhower exchange fellowships. The head of this great organization, Mr. Theodore S. Repplier, is the first nongovernment American to study our information activities abroad.

Mr. Repplier has written me in part as follows:

I can testify from firsthand experience that sending samples of American culture abroad, from art shows to symphony orchestras to trade fairs, is a tested way to explode the damaging myth that Americans are cultureless dollar chasers. Often one American exhibit or performance can create a favorable impression that has lasting weight.

I heartily concur also with your view that an advisory committee could be helpful in counseling on this cultural offensive, although I am sure there are people better qualified to serve than I.

It seems to me important that there be wider recognition of the all-important fact that the more the danger of atomic warfare recedes, the more certainty there is that the ultimate outcome of the struggle between the Communist and free worlds will be decided by ideas and ideas alone.

It seems to me that victory is increasingly likely to go to the side which most successfully projects its ideas and ideals to the rest of the world. It would be tragic if the Geneva Conference caused us to slacken our information and cultural offensive just when it is beginning to hit its stride.

Thank you so very much for your attention to my earlier remarks. And congratulations on your grasp of a subject the importance of which is so often underrated.

In a brilliant speech at the Hotel Pierre, New York City, on June 30, 1955, at a meeting of the Advertising Council's board of directors and guests, Mr. Repplier reported on his study of our information methods abroad. He said our propaganda offensive needs to sharpen its ideas. Also, we need to draw into our propaganda program more of the skills and talents of America. Mr. Repplier is convinced that no group of professional propagandists, however able, can project a true image of the country, at an art exhibit, a trade fair, or anywhere else. "In America we have private organizations—from the Philadelphia Symphony to the Advertising Council—whose weight must be added to the idea war," he declared.

We can win the cold war but we cannot win it in a walk. It is time we started running. Mr. Repplier pointed out in his speech that—

The idea war needs more firepower. We are terribly outgunned. We now spend less than two-tenths of 1 percent of our military budget on propaganda. How can we possibly expect that truth can triumph over falsehood with that sort of niggardliness? The propaganda appropriation should be greatly increased.

Mr. Repplier is not alone in making these recommendations. A firm and open decision "to win the cold war," as the "surest way to prevent a hot war," was urged upon our Government by Brig. Gen. David Sarnoff, chairman of the board of the Radio Corporation of America, in a memorandum presented to the White House on April 5, 1955. Pointing out that the Kremlin's fixed goal is world dominion by means short of an all-out war, General Sarnoff declared:

Logically we have no alternative but to acknowledge the reality of the cold war and proceed to turn Moscow's favorite weapons against world communism. Our political counterstrategy has to be as massive, as intensive, as flexible as the enemy's.

The question, in truth, is no longer whether we should engage in the cold war. The Soviet drive is forcing us to take countermeasures in any case. The question, rather, is whether we should undertake it with a clear-headed determination to use all means deemed essential, by governments and by private groups, to win the contest.

General Sarnoff's memorandum entitled "Program for a Political Offensive Against World Communism," grew out of his discussion of the subject with President Eisenhower in Washington on the morning of March 15, and announced at the time by James Hagerty, White House press secretary.

The same afternoon, at the President's request, General Sarnoff conferred with Nelson Rockefeller, Special Assistant to the President on psychological warfare, and officials from the United States Information Agency and the Central Intelligence Agency. At the end of the meeting he undertook to submit his views on the subject and a suggested program of action.

The result was his memorandum, in which he emphasized that—

We must go from defense to attack in meeting the political, ideological, subversive challenge. The problem—is one of attaining the requisite magnitude, financing, coordination, and continuity of action. The expanded offensive with nonmilitary means must be imbued with a new awareness of the great goal and a robust will to reach it.

He said—

General Sarnoff urged the establishment of a Strategy Board for Political Defense, the cold war equivalent of the Joint Chiefs of Staff on the military side. As to financing such a strategy board, the general recalled that appropriations over the past 4 years for our military defense averaged approximately $45 billion annually. In contrast, he noted, it is significant to note that for the fiscal year 1955 the total appropriation for the United States Information Agency was $79 million, of which $17 million is available for the worldwide activities of the Voice of America.

As a working hypothesis General Sarnoff suggested that a specific and more realistic ration between military and nonmilitary appropriations be worked out: say an amount equivalent to 5 or 7½ percent of military-defense appropriations to be granted to the Strategy Board for Political Defense—this, of course, without reducing the military budget and not counting foreign military aid and point 4 types of expenditure. General Sarnoff made this further point:

I am convinced that if the American people and their Congress are made fully aware of the menace we face, of the urgent need for meeting it, and the possibility of doing so by means short of war, they will respond willingly as they have always done in times of national crisis. They will realize that no investment to win the cold war is exorbitant when measured against the costs of the bombing war we seek to head off.

In a historic speech at the National Press Club here in Washington, D. C., on February 26, 1955, William Randolph Hearst, Jr., editor in chief of the Hearst newspapers, said that our reliance upon armed strength is permitting communism to take long strides forward in those fields which we have largely neglected. He pointed out that in Russia and the satellite countries "sports, ballet, the theater, literature—all are shaped toward aiding communism's long-range scheme of world domination. Top artists know they are not only expected to perform, but to give their services at clinics where the plastic minds of youthful visitors can be influenced."

Like General Sarnoff and Theodore S. Repplier, Mr. Hearst advocated the establishment of a permanent planning board commissioned to formulate a strategy on all fronts for meeting the challenge of competitive coexistence. This board should be, he said, scrupulously nonpartisan. It should be culled from the finest minds and talents available, both in public and private life. He said on this that—

It should survey the whole global scene and develop plans for getting the peoples of the world on our side. Sports, the theater, educational exchanges—no field should be neglected in this competition of the two conflicting systems.

Who can doubt that America would emerge on top in any such competition?

My suggestion is not blueprinted. It may even be a little vague. But formulating and implementing it would be the job of the planning group of men and women, each devoting time and energy to developing an overall American strategy in those nonmilitary fields for 1955—and for the next generation.

We have a National Security Council. I would like to see a national competitive coexistence council to combat communism.

One side or the other is going to win the battle of competitive coexistence.

It had better be our side.

Everyone and everything we love and cherish is at stake.

There is, of course, deep and profound concern in the Congress with cold war strategy. Senator LYNDON B. JOHNSON of Texas has called for the "greatest political offensive in history to win the cold war" and Senator ALEXANDER WILEY, ranking minority member of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, speaking at the Wayne University student forum, has called for all-out support of the proposals before the 84th Congress for the establishment of a program of cultural interchange with foreign countries to meet the challenge of competitive coexistence with communism. Hearings have been held on H. R. 6874 and a number of related bills which would make such a program a permanent part of the armament of our country in this cold war period and action is expected on them early in the second session of this Congress.

The Congress recently appropriated $5 million to continue the President's emergency fund for participation in international affairs. With funds supplied by this fund the United States is fighting the cold war on two new fronts. Both are important and on both the Communists have a head start on us. Under the program the United States has participated in 15 trade fairs during the current year, and more than 23 cultural projects have been undertaken. Among the most successful of the cultural programs sent abroad under the fund are Porgy and Bess, which toured Europe, and the symphony of the air which was a smash hit in Asia. In the sports field, the program includes tours by star athletes who have been sent abroad by the State Department in cooperation with the Amateur Athletic Union. Trade fairs and cultural activities are areas of the cold war which the United States cannot neglect any longer.

Communist goods exhibited at trade fairs have often been of inferior quality—but how are other peoples to know that if there are no United States exhibits to make the contrast clear? In the absence of first-rate American participation, the Communists have been winning by default.

In the cultural field it is, again, only a question of giving other peoples an opportunity to see, listen, and judge. Here, again, we have the goods. The best rebuttal of Communist charges that Americans are uncultured, crass, material-minded barbarians, a favorite Communist propaganda line, is to present our country's cultural programs abroad. For years the Communists have tried to present themselves as devoted to the arts, to the better things of life. For years troupes of artists from the U. S. S. R., and more recently from Communist China, have been sent abroad by their governments to make friends and influence people for communism. That the Russian ballet, admittedly among the best in the world, has its roots in Czarist Russia is ignored. The ballet is Communist, they say. It is a potent argument for the Marxian line. Music, art, sports—all are grist for the Communist mills. They exploit their artists and sportsmen as they exploit everything else, and they have been doing it effectively, make no mistake about that.

In his testimony before the Subcommittee on State, Justice, Judiciary, and related agencies of the Committee on Appropriations of the House of Representatives Frank Coniff of the Hearst newspapers had this to say in support of the activities being carried on under the President's emergency fund for participation in international affairs:

Mr. ROONEY. Now, Mr. Coniff, we shall be very glad to hear from you.

STATEMENT OF FRANK CONIFF

Mr. CONIFF. Thank you, Congressman ROONEY, for the opportunity to be here. I am sorry Mr. Hearst himself is not here. I talked to him yesterday. He is on a business trip through Europe, and he said he would certainly be here if his schedule had permitted.

I have here a report on Russia which I would like to have inserted in the RECORD. These are a series of articles which appeared in our newspapers several months ago.

Mr. ROONEY. If you have sufficient copies and will leave them here, we shall see that each member of the committee gets one. It costs a lot of money to print these, but each member will have an opportunity to read it.

Mr. CONIFF. This booklet is interesting in view of the fact it was written mostly in the week of February 13, which was 5 days after the Malenkov upheaval in Russia, and I think it accurately forecasts the shift in Russian tactics we have encountered in recent months. We were there at the time the new shift was heralded, when Malenkov stepped down, and Mr. Khrushchev became the chief power in Russia.

While we were there we gained the impression that our policy of building armed strength had proven a detriment to Russia in any thoughts Russia might have of precipitating a third world war as a means of gaining its end. Anything I say is predicated on the belief we should continue to build our strength and continue to build our technical proficiency to the extent they will exceed anything Russia can bring against us.

However, as Mr. Hearst says in this booklet—and again I say this was written at a time when alarmist reports filled most of the air and the press in the wake of the disturbance in Russia so that even at the time we were writing this we wondered if we were right, and we are gratified we did not give anyone a wrong steer—Mr. Hearst says on page 46:

"The Soviet Union can't stand a war with the West within the foreseeable future, and therefore won't start one. I have further predicted that Russia's realistic rulers will exert a cooling influence to keep the Chinese teapot from boiling over."

This was at the time of the Tachen evacuation, when it looked like war would break out at any moment. [Continuing reading:]

" 'We're glad the fire in Korea was put out,' Khrushchev told us. 'We don't want to see another one start up.' "

Mr. Hearst writes:

"The democracies won't start a war with the Soviet Union because it is against the very nature of democracy to launch an aggressive war.

"The only spark that might touch off an atomic showdown, as I have repeatedly stated, would be the failure of the West to keep up its guard and encourage the Kremlin to think we were weak and defenseless."

Then Mr. Hearst writes—and I think it gets to the core of what you gentlemen are considering here:

"If I am right in thinking that war is no solution to the current struggle, and that Russia will not pull the trigger for varying reasons, then we pass into the much more difficult battleground of peace.

"The West is well equipped in any trial at arms. But are we prepared practically and philosophically to surpass communism in the thornier problems of peace?"

It was a strange impression to gather in Russia that these leaders who were talking so belligerently on the floor of the Supreme Soviet were so anxious to convey the impression back here that they were not going to start a war, but we did gain the impression that they had the idea that in the coming years they could so manipulate events that they would gain an edge on us in this cold war, which I think is now more a soft war. A cold war is a form of a hot war, and this soft war will be another form of a hard war, a hard war by another means, so to speak.

In accordance to their own theory, the Russians seem to feel that every form of endeavor is subject to the ideological struggle, and a thing like sports and the theater and an avenue like literature are weapons to the Russians in this struggle with us.

If there was any one frightening thing to us in talking to these Russian leaders, it was their belief that in coming years communism would gain the upper hand. Khrushchev said to us in so many words that communism would gain the upper hand in the long run. That is quite jarring to Americans and leads to the conclusion that it is up to us to devise a strategy to help in preparing America for this conflict that the Russians do not think we have a chance of winning. They think we are going to ignore most of these fields and leave them open to the Russians and to Communist infiltration and Communist propaganda, and that in our concentration on material things we will ignore these things of the spirit.

They have taken such a subject as sports and they are taking dead aim on the Olympics next year as a source of great prestige for the Communist idea. We have enjoyed the fact that America has dominated the Olympic games for some time. They hope to appeal to the youth of the world with their athletes who, in 1956, and certainly in 1960, will pose a serious threat to our superiority.

In the other fields, in the theater and in literature, they are also using their own artists and their own performers as agents of Communist imperialism. They do it very subtly. The artists know they are subject to the State and must carry out their dictates.

It is the impression of Mr. Hearst and Mr. Kingsbury Smith and myself that our American artists can help also in winning opinion among our allies, among the uncommitted nations, and even back of the Iron Curtain we can do a lot to dispel the thought that America is concerned only with material things. Some headway has already been made in that.

It is our belief, after seeing and talking to the Russians and seeing what they have, in the limited scope of our trip, that America has so much to offer, so many fine things to be seen, and so many more decent and good things to show, that we must bring them to bear in whatever way we can in this struggle, which, of course, we think will continue within our time and certainly within the foreseeable future.

I hesitate to inflict an opinion on the committee because the operations of Congress are not exactly my purview, but I do think that some start has to be made, and in saying this I echo the opinion of Mr. Hearst. Some start has to be made first in comprehending the phase of communism we are now entering, and secondly, in fashioning the weapons that will aid us in winning this struggle.

Mr. Hearst said at the National Press Club, and has repeated in numerous statements, the belief that one side or the other one will prevail. We are in agreement with Mr. Khrushchev on that, that the second half of this century will determine which way of life will gain the upperhand, and our observations—Mr. Hearst's, Mr. Smith's, and my own—have seen our country emerge into world leadership whether it asked for it or not, and we have seen it acquit itself of this responsibility in a way which I believe no previous recorded history presents any example quite as fine or as magnificent.

If I may use Mr. Hearst's words in approaching this subject, he said we of this generation can see very clearly that perhaps we are not in immediate danger, for strategic reasons we feel our generation will survive any attempt to overthrow it, but he says we have to think of the future years, of our children and the kind of world they will live in, and therefore it becomes necessary to organize the planning and the thinking that will enable us to emerge victorious in this struggle.

It is fundamental with Mr. Hearst and with our appreciation of what is going on in the world that the struggle with communism will last a long time, that these complacent interludes are more difficult to understand and to win than the sheer showdown of a shooting war or of a tense period in international relations. He wrote in February that the cold war—and we were using the term at the time—that the cold war is going to be much more subtle than it was under Stalin. Of course at that time we had no means of knowing that the moves of the Russians were then in progress, the Austrian settlement and the overtures to West Germany and things like that. So it will be more subtle and more difficult to understand, and in passing I might say that the Communists by their own theory will make any move and condone any move if it helps them in their struggle. For instance, Khrushchev and Bulganin went to Belgrade recently in a mood that might be interpreted as an apology, with hat in hand, but it was not an apology and Tito understood it was a shift and a tactical move.

We say in here—again pointing out it was written in February when much alarmist talk filled the air—we say Russia wants peace because it needs peace. It is not equipped for a showdown with us at this time on a shooting basis so they are bargaining for time. If there is a part of this booklet we are proud of it is chapter 3, dealing with Russia's weaknesses. Communism in Russia, as we saw it, is under great stresses. They have many conflicts that might well be insoluble. They have problems which, even without a cold war, would still remain, and they are having terrible trouble in solving them.

I do not want to take too much of your time, but this is all a prelude to our thinking that a good deal of planning for the coming phase of what we call competitive coexistence is needed. If there is some money available that will aid us in this year of 1955 to accurately anticipate Russian moves, that will bring us into contact with them in ways that will not provoke a war but will still enable us to make ground in this struggle, we are confident the net result will be a gain to the United States.

I must apologize for not having our idea of a competitive coexistent council in more concrete terms, but, as we say in this book, that would be the task of a planning board, to understand the struggle and to perhaps plan the ways of bringing it to a successful conclusion.

I understand before this committee is a specific recommendation for certain moneys to be allotted for cultural endeavors. We believe that any of our artists that go abroad should recognize that in a sense they are American citizens who are doing a duty to their country and that their appearance and their performance and their conduct will have a direct bearing on the results of our trouble with the Communists. We think that they should attempt to get close to the people in the countries where they perform, they should be available at clinics where the young people who might be interested in the theater or in sports could get to them, and it should not be regarded as a triumphant parade or excursion, but as a definite contribution to good competitive coexistence.

I was reading that Oklahoma will be shown in Europe, and I think that is fine, and I understand some dignitary is giving the cast a garden party and that it will be the social event of the season. A little social life does not hurt anybody, but my opinion is that it will not particularly contribute to our success in the ideological struggle; but if it could be arranged, by planning and by knowledge of what is going on, for them to see the young people and talk to them and answer their questions, I am sure it would be a step forward.

We just came back from Russia so full of the belief that the American way of life has so much more to offer than the Russian way of life that if we can let the people of the world see it, believe me, any comparison is bound to tip the balance in our favor.

I think I am rambling a little bit here and perhaps getting away from the core of what you gentlemen are interested in, but that is our only message, the message of Mr. Hearst, that some comparison of what is going on must be grasped by our policymakers now, and some means of combating this cold war must be devised.

Mr. ROONEY. Thank you for your very interesting statement. You must realize that the committee has the advantage of advice from the State Department from the top level and has access to intelligence, and so forth, in regard to the situation between the Soviet Union and the United States today.

The conclusion reached by Mr. Hearst, General Sarnoff, and Theodore Repplier was that our propaganda offensive needs to sharpen its ideas and needs to be increased many times in size. Also, that we need to draw into our propaganda program more of the skills and talents of America. As Mr. Repplier says, "In America, we have private organizations—from the Philadelphia Symphony to the advertising council—whose weight must be added to the idea war."

One place to begin adding the weight of private organizations to our idea war would be to bring them in, in an advisory capacity, and thus make them part of, any program for the expansion of cultural, scientific, and social contacts which the Federal Government undertakes. Authority for this very step is contained in Public Law 402, 80th Congress, particularly in title VIII, section 801 (6). In carrying out the purposes of this act the Secretary of State is authorized "to create, with the approval of the Commission on Information and the Commission on Educational Exchange, such advisory committees as the Secretary may decide to be of assistance in formulating his policies for carrying out the purposes of this act." It is my understanding that the powers and authorities granted under this act of the Congress for the appointment of such an advisory committee on the arts and cultural exchange have never been exercised. In any event, now would seem to be a particularly appropriate time to create such an advisory committee.

This advisory committee, if it is appointed, will obviously be of great importance in our relations with other nations and it should, therefore, be composed of men of the highest caliber and leadership ability. If I may take the liberty of making a few suggestions I would think the following admirably exemplify the qualities needed: Theodore S. Repplier; Brig. Gen. David Sarnoff; Senators Alexander Wiley, H. Alexander Smith, Karl S. Mundt, Theodore Francis Green; William Randolph Hearst, Jr.; Eugene and Agnes E. Meyer, of the Washington Post and Times Herald; James C. Petrillo, George Meany; Walter Reuther; Dr. Detlev W. Bronk, president, National Academy of Sciences and the National Research Council; Alan T. Waterman, National Science Foundation; Dr. Leonard Carmichael, of the Smithsonian Institution; Dr. Sammy Lee, outstanding American athlete who recently made a special tour to 12 countries in the Far East to tell about the American way of life in behalf of the Department of State; Clarence E. Pickett, American Friends Service Committee; and Secretary of Agriculture Ezra Taft Benson.

Also, from the world of business and philanthropy: Nelson Rockefeller, Henry Ford II, and Harvey Firestone. From the theater and movies: Robert W. Dowling, president of the congressionally chartered American National Theater and Academy; Dr. Gilbert V. Hartke, president of the American Educational Theater Association; Ralph Becker, of the National Association of Legitimate Theaters; and Eric Johnston, president of the Motion Picture Association of America, Inc.,; and Lee Norvelle, president of the National Theater Conference.

From the art world, David E. Finley, director of the National Gallery of Art; Lloyd Goodrich, chairman of the Committee on Government and Art; Henry R. Hope, editor of the College Art Journal.

As architects: Wallace K. Harrison, Pietro Belluschi, Eero Saarinen, and Otto Eggers.

From music: Dr. Howard Hanson, president of the 800,000-member National Music Council; Bruno Walter, conductor; Rudolf Bing, of the Metropolitan Opera Co.; Patrick Hayes, chairman of the Cultural Development Committee of the Washington Board of Trade; Dr. Frederick Fall, conductor of the United States Department of Agriculture Symphony Orchestra and former conductor-in-chief of the Vienna Volksoper; and Dr. Warner Lawson, head of the department of music at Howard University, Washington, D. C.

Also, Milo Christiansen, past president, American Recreation Society.

For composers and authors: Richard Rogers; Oscar Hammerstein II; Ira Gershwin; Norman Dello Joio; Gian-Carlo Menotti; William Faulkner and Ernest Hemingway, Nobel Prize winners; Harold Spivacke, of the Library of Congress; and Howard Mitchell, conductor of the National Symphony Orchestra, Washington, D. C.

Not Exactly in High

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MELVIN PRICE

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 2, 1955

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Speaker, many of us have been troubled by the delays and confusion that have been notorious in the administration of the Refugee Relief Act.

The following editorial from the St. Louis Post-Dispatch suggests the experience of one single community with the law and the almost barren results that have followed as a result of what we in Congress hoped would be a useful piece of legislation:

NOT EXACTLY IN HIGH

The arrival of 34 refugees from Europe this week was a heart-warming experience for St. Louis as well as for the newcomers. They lived originally in Eastern Europe. Driven from there by war, they had spent years in oppression, wandering and confusion. Finally they reached the Statue of Liberty, where they read that great welcome to "the huddled masses yearning to breathe free."

These 34 refugees were rescued from the huddle of postwar Europe under terms of the Refugee Relief Act of 1953. So this is a good time to ask, once more, how the work of that legislation is progressing.

Readers will remember the congressional uproar last spring over the firing of Edward J. Corsi as deputee refugee administrator. It was disclosed then that while the law called for admission of 214,000 refugees by the end of 1956, only 3,000 bona fide refugees had been admitted. Criticism centered equally on the law itself and on its administrator, Scott McLeod, State Department security officer.

In the 5 months since then Mr. McLeod and the State Department have offered several hopeful statements about putting the program into "high gear." And the Department now says that "about 30,000" persons have been admitted to our shores, not specifying how many actually were refugees.

In short, half the time allotted for the refugee program has expired, and one-seventh of the number of refugees supposed to be admitted has been admitted.

Myths About Aging

OF

HON. PETER W. RODINO, JR.

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 2, 1955

Mr. RODINO. Mr. Speaker, the Members of this Congress are aware of my long-term interest in the special problems which face the older members of the American community in our time. I have always insisted that we must obtain more information as to the nature and complexity of these problems so that we may act intelligently and humanely to relieve them. We know that one result of the fact that our life expectancy has been increased by about 20 years since 1900 has given more people a chance to live longer. We know that census estimates indicate that, by 1975 there will be 20 million people aged 65 and over in this country—or nearly twice the number we have today.

Last year, in introducing my bill (H. R. 3313) to establish a commission to study old-age and retirement benefits, I said:

Some people talk as if the facts of our time—this miracle of a longer life—is in the nature of a national calamity. I do not agree with that kind of thinking for 1 minute. We have never, in this country, been afraid of problems growing out of progress. And one of the healthiest indications of the dynamics of democracy is the evidence that American communities, churches, labor unions, and public officials are starting to study these problems with the confidence that intelligence, sympathy, and imagination will produce good answers.

Mr. Speaker, the results of one such study have just appeared in the form of a 172-page report, The States and Their Older Citizens, conducted for the Council of State Governments. Summarizing the contents of this report, the Christian Science Monitor made the following comments:

The Council of State Governments has produced an excellent study of the needs of older people in the United States in response to a request from the Governors' Conference of 1954. Entitled "The States and Their Older Citizens," it draws together the findings of many studies made in various States and localities in the last few years.

The outstanding feature of this report is its indication that people of retirement age or near are more concerned now about retaining the opportunity to work than they are about increased pensions or other retirement income. This does not mean that company pensions, old-age insurance, and old-age assistance are unimportant, but that, with these foundations laid, the average oldster does not wish to incur idleness as the price of security.

The bill of objectives for older people formulated in the study lists, first, equal opportunity to work. In a program for action, the report urges governments, employers, and unions to abolish compulsory automatic retirement at a fixed age and to substitute flexible, selective retirement policies. It urges State governments to lead in abandoning the age critierion in hiring or laying off employees.

Other recommendations include: Assurance of adequate minimum income, including more liberal old-age assistance where needed; encouragement of older people to live in their own homes so far as feasible; provision to homelike institutional care for those who require it; rehabilitation work, including vocational retraining; and opportunity for older citizens to participate in recreational and other community activities.

Not all of the matter of employment opportunities is to be reached by legislation or even working contracts. "A prime requisite," says the study, "is an extensive program of public education—one that will dispel popular myths about aging. * * * Once the myths about aging and its inevitable helplessness are dispelled, the major roadblocks to constructive action for older citizens will have been removed."

I am convinced that a thorough study of this report would be of inestimable value to all of us. For it contains the statistical story of what is happening to our senior citizens in terms of the inadequacy of their income, of the problem of living arrangements and family relations, and the problem of employment. Moreover, it goes beyond this necessary background data to show how hundreds of communities throughout the country are beginning to seek the kind of good answers I predicted we would find.

We must, of course, know the facts—many more facts than we have available at the present. For in its own important way the factual story dispels some of the myths which have grown up in our time. One of these myths is that our older citizens retire from their jobs as soon as possible to live the rest of their years in the sun.

But, as this report shows, the facts are quite the opposite. Most older persons want to work and continue working as long as they are physically fit and can find employment. Less than 1 out of 25 workers retire to enjoy leisure, the remainder are compelled to retire either for reasons of health or because they have lost their jobs and cannot find new employment. Also cited in the report are the preliminary findings of a study of 3,515 employees aged 63 and 64, working in 265 businesses, industrial, governmental, and private organizations in 23 industries, which showed that older workers are opposed to compulsory retirement at a fixed age. According to these findings, 77 percent of the workers interviewed said that, if it were up to them alone, they would continue working for the same employer. Similarly, results of the 20th century fund retirement survey, also cited, show that 57 percent of pensioners are retired by the company because of age, that another 25 percent are retired because of poor health or accident, and that only 9 percent retired voluntarily to have some time to themselves. In my own State of New Jersey, for example, 42.4 percent of persons aged 65 and over are still working, another 16.5 percent are receiving old-age social-security benefits, and just 4.6 percent are receiving old-age assistance.

We Cannot Lose

OFTEN an idea has to take seed and lie dormant quite a while before it begins to thrust above ground into acceptance and action. Such has been the case with the proposal to establish a national planning board to work with or within the State Department as a kind of intelligence unit in the Battle of Competitive Coexistence with communism.

Acceptance and action now seem to be on the way. The State Department has informed Rep. Frank Thompson, New Jersey Democrat who has been vigorously pushing the plan, that it is considering an advisory committee to help direct a cultural and sports offensive. The matter is scheduled to come up next Monday before the Department's Commission on Educational Exchange.

The idea of a planning board first was put forward by William Randolph Hearst Jr. in a speech Jan. 28 before the National Press Club in Washington on his return from leading a Hearst journalistic task force to Moscow, with the world-beat interviews with top Soviet brass. He gave the projected board the name Competitive Coexistence Council.

Next, Brig. Gen. David Sarnoff, board chairman of the Radio Corporation of America, proposed creation of a Government strategy board to coordinate efforts to win the cold war. The Hearst and Sarnoff plans differed in details but were identical in purpose. At that time we suggested that brilliant and energetic General Sarnoff would make a very good chairman of such a body. We repeat the suggestion.

Red Visit Proved It

In the time that followed, the idea evidently was taking seed in the State Department and no doubt it was nourished considerably by the exchange visits of American and Russian farm groups. The impact of free enterprise and other aspects of American freedom on the visiting Russians was tremendous. Back of Mr. Hearst's plan, and unquestionably of General Sarnoff's too, was the conviction that in any such exchange this nation could not lose. The visit of the Russian farm group did much to prove it.

Now we read with satisfaction that the wonderful American folk opera, "Porgy and Bess," that has helped win friends for this country all over Europe and Latin America, is going to Moscow. The formal invitation has been made and accepted, and we predict the show will be a Moscow smash.

Clearly, a planning board (we haven't heard of a better title than Competitive Coexistence Council) must comprise, to be of value, good and vigorous representatives of American culture and sports. It should not be so big that it is clumsy, nor so small that it is narrow in its interests. And clearly, also, in its program it should choose only the very best America has to offer. The second rate will not be good enough.

With such a board and such a program this country cannot lose.

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

By PAUL HENRY LANG

A 'Don't Buy American' Art

Our touring orchestras are about to return from their exhibition games abroad, but the triumphal notices of their successes preceded them and were duly displayed by our proud press; "tremendous virtuosity," "shattering climaxes," "unmatched precision," are some of the epithets used. They are undoubtedly deserved, but by no means tell the whole story.

Admittedly, these organizations, sponsored and partly financed by the State Department, go abroad with the express purpose of showing that we have not only cowpunchers, gangsters, comics, bathing beauties, and athletes, but art and artists. But what do the European audiences usually see and hear when these superb orchestras appear? Conductors who first came to fame in their native Europe, and music that is part of everyday European life.

I want to make it clear that I am not making the stars twinkle and the stripes glow; a critic should judge art solely for what it is, but these trips have been organized for a very specific purpose, and I do not see how the venture can be justified in the face of the original directives and the results obtained.

European View

Europe has an entirely false and simplified picture of our orchestral music. According to widespread belief, we buy up the best orchestral players available in Europe, engage their best conductors, and pronto, we've got everything without putting into the enterprise anything but money, of which there is an oversupply in these States. This may have been true many years ago, but certainly does not obtain these days. Our music schools have filled the ranks of our orchestras with excellently trained American musicians, most of whom are superior to their counterparts in Europe. This is one of the points that should be gotten across.

The case of the conductors is much more complicated. Again, we do have very able American conductors, but since they have little opportunity to operate with big league orchestras they have neither the reputation nor, in some instances, the experience, of the elderly maestros we import. This is a domestic problem that will be solved in due course, and in the meantime we are fortunate to have such great artists at the head of our premier orchestras.

Now, if they refuse to learn new scores and ride the war horses while at home, that's one thing, our public is the loser; but when they are sent abroad on a mission it is the height of folly to permit them to indulge in the old laissez-faire game. Mr. Ormandy at least made a fair stab at the problem, but the New York Philharmonic disregarded the purpose of their European appearances, and in some instances actually contributed, even though unwittingly, to the canards concerning our music.

American Music?

It is downright silly to be compelled to plead for the inclusion of American works in these programs. What is this, a protectionist policy in reverse? Strategic materials kept from the enemy? No tariff act has ever been more ruthlessly enforced, no export policy more efficiently controlled, than this embargo on American music to Europe. We have a whole bevy of distinguished composers who can hold their own in any competition. And aside from the fact that it is the least one can ask from the conductor of an American orchestra sent abroad to demonstrate American music, the foreign audiences naturally expect the visitors to show home made wares. I have been asked time and again when in Europe this past summer, "Why don't they play American music?"

The irony of the whole business is that aside from the usual "classics" the only major works played were by Prokofiev and Shostakovitch which the New Yorkers topped off with an encore—Kabalevsky. Even the bonus offering was by a Russian. It is almost as if to say, in Berlin or Vienna, which are among those "sensitive areas" the State Department likes to placate: "We will show you how great the music of the Russians really is; we ourselves have nothing of this sort."

A Suggestion

It is with reluctance that all this is written, for I have a good deal of admiration for the orchestras and conductors involved, but it is impossible to overlook the fact that an artistic mission that does have important political overtones which, given the world we live in, cannot be dismissed in the name of "pure" art, has been muffed. A very simple outline should be followed by American orchestras sent abroad. They should play a work by a living composer of the country visited and a work by a representative American composer, the rest of the program may be the rest of the program may be given over to the standard repertory.

The Marshall Plan stuff sent abroad bore conspicuous markings demonstrating the American origin of the offerings. Congress insisted on that. Under the circumstances I don't see why the principle does not apply to music.

International Exchange

Information Action Urged

By Josephine Ripley
Staff Correspondent of The Christian Science Monitor

Washington

Success of the exchange visits of Soviet and American farm experts has convinced Representative Frank Thompson, Jr., (D) of New Jersey that the time is ripe for a major step-up in this kind of two-way traffic.

For months he has been urging, in petitions to Congress and the administration, that the United States send teams of artists, athletes, scholars, and businessmen into foreign countries to set straight the Communist-twisted story of this country and its people.

The inching up of the Iron Curtain and the relaxation of world tensions, to some extent, since the Big Four meeting at Geneva confirms Mr. Thompson's feeling that the time has come for the United States to put its best propaganda foot forward abroad.

That is not all. He has a specific suggestion. He has put it before the President. He has put it up to the Secretary of State. He has put it before Congress.

What he proposes is the formation of an advisory committee on cultural interchange. Authority for such a committee is already contained, he points out, under the Smith-Mundt Act of the 80th Congress, and the time for its formation is ripe.

He urges not just another "governmental committee," but one made up of representatives of the arts, business, sports, labor unons, Congress, and so on,, drawn from all sections and segments of the nation.

While billions of dollars are being spent on national defense, only a minute fraction of that amount is going for the introduction of American arts, culture, and people abroad, where viewpoints have been often badly distorted by Communist propaganda.

The tremendous success of "Porgy and Bess" in its tour of the European countries, and the possibility that it may even run up the curtain in Moscow itself, has proven, in Mr. Thompson's estimation, the tremendous good-will value of traveling groups of this kind.

"Cinerama," the very moving film presentation of the United States and its people, has made a tremendous impact on European audiences. The National Broadcasting Symphony of the Air, in its tour of the Far East, drew accolades of praise.

Representative Thompson's plea for increased participation by the United States in international trade fairs is already being carried out in a joint program of the Departments of Commerce, State, and United States Information Agency.

Propaganda Picture

While the United States has lagged behind in its presentation of the American story, well-financed Communist propaganda has pictured Americans as crass, dollar-grabbing barbarians, without culture and grace.

Mr. Thompson, in his plea for more emphasis and more money for a well-planned propaganda offensive from this side, suggests that any advisory committee on cultural interchange include some of the following persons:

Theodore S. Repplier, president of the Advertising Council, who recently made an independent study of United States propaganda methods abroad; Brig. Gen. David Sarnoff of the Radio Corporation of America; publisher Eugene Meyer and Mrs. Agnes E. Meyer of the Washington Post and Times Herald; representatives of the nation's leading labor unions; Dr. Detlev W. Bronk, president of the National Academy of Sciences; Republican Senators Alexander Wiley, H. Alexander Smith, Karl E. Mundt; Democratic Senator Theodore F. Green; William Randolph Hearst, Jr., Dr. Leonard Carmichael of the Smithsonian Institution and others.

Art in Washington

Legislation Favoring the Arts

A Mexican couple viewing the USIA exhibition, "American Prints," now touring Latin America.

By Leslie Judd Portner

WHEN A STATESMAN who is also an amateur painter moved into the White House, hopes soared high in the art world that at last there might be some legislation which would serve the cause of art at home and abroad. Many lawmakers had long been convinced that art could be a most effective international ambassador, but it remained for this Congress to enact some oft-proposed, long-range programs which never before had had effective backing from the White House.

Mrs. Portner

The record of this past Congress in support of art has been admirable. Four accomplishments stand out:

1. Passage of a bill, introduced by Frank Thompson (D-N. J.), which more than tripled the appropriation for the Commission of Fine Arts here, raising the amount allocated to this advisory body from $10,000 to $35,000. The Commission advises the President on all artistic matters relating to the District of Columbia, and may be called upon by Federal agencies for help in cultural matters.

2. Passage of a bill authorizing the formation of a 21-man commission to submit plans by February, 1956, for a civic and cultural center in Washington. The building is to include an Inaugural Hall of the Presidents, and a music, fine arts and mass communications center.

3. Extension of the President's Emergency Fund for a second year, with an appropriation of $5 million for international cultural exchange and for trade fairs. Half of this amount was allocated to the Commerce Department for the trade fairs; the other half went to the State Department for the International Educational Exchange Service.

4. Holding of hearings on some 15 bills to make the President's Emergency Fund a permanent program of the State Department, and to establish a permanent Federal Advisory Commission on Art in the Department of Health, Education and Welfare, as proposed by President Eisenhower. These hearings are to be resumed during the next session of Congress.

JUST WHAT is the President's Emergency Fund, and what has it to do with art?

On July 27, 1954, President Eisenhower addressed a letter to the President of the Senate requesting the sum of $5 million to be expended at his discretion "to meet extraordinary or unusual circumstances arising in the international affairs of the Government." The letter specifically stressed the need to participate in international trade fairs, where the Russians had made tremendous gains in advertising their way of life through their products. The President added: "In the cultural and artistic fields as well we need greater resources to assist and encourage private musical, dramatic and other cultural groups to go forth and demonstrate that America too can lay claim to high cultural and artistic accomplishments."

The funds were immediately allocated, and the International Educational Exchange Service in the State Department took charge of the cultural programs. A contract was signed with ANTA (American National Theatre and Academy) under Director Robert W. Dowling to send theatrical and musical groups and solo artists all over the world on extended tours of goodwill.

IEES helped underwrite the "Salute to France" program which has had such remarkable success this past year; it sent the "Porgy and Bess" company first to special showings in Yugoslavia and the Mediterranean countries, and then to South America; the Philadelphia Orchestra was sent to Spain and Portugal after its ANTA-sponsored performances in Paris; the NBC Orchestra is just back from a triumphant tour of the Far East; the New York Philharmonic is on its way to the Edinburgh and Berlin Festivals; New York's Ballet Theatre is now touring South America; Martha Graham leaves in the fall for a dance tour of Southeast Asia, and so on. An arrangement was made with the Amateur Athletic Union to send athletes to compete in international games and to give demonstrations of skill. IEES also continues to administer the Fulbright and Smith-Mundt programs for the international exchange of students and professors in many fields.

MEANWHILE the United States Information Agency has continued its programs in the visual arts, sending outstanding exhibitions of painting, sculpture and handicrafts all over the world. Some of its new projects include a year's tour in Europe of the Pennsylvania Academy's 150th Anniversary Exhibition, and the international circulation of such exhibits as "American Cartoons," Bridges Are Beautiful," "American Watercolors," "American Primitive Painting," "Highlights of American Painting," "The Family of Man," "Contemporary American Glass," "Ceramics from the Cannes Festival" and "American Prints."

USIA works closely with the State Department in all its programming, and uses its overseas services to arrange advance publicity for the theatrical and musical projects that the State Department underwrites. Both agencies work closely with a presidential committee which meets monthly to discuss all aspects of the combined programs.

With enlightened Congressmen and Senators working in cooperation with a President personally concerned in their success, these measures should go far to enhance the prestige of our country abroad, not only on a material but on a cultural level as well.

Statement of Rep. Frank Thompson, Jr. (D. N.J.)
Before the Subcommittee on State, Justice,
Judiciary, and related agencies of the House Committee on Appropriations in support of the President's Emergency Fund, ~~Monday, June 13,~~ 1955

Mr. Chairman, and Members of the Subcommittee; JUN 14 1955

With funds supplied by the President's Emergency Fund, the United States is fighting the cold war on two new fronts. Both are important. And on both the Communists have a head start on us.

The head start, however, need not discourage us. These are both fields in which the United States has no need to worry if we exert ourselves. The only danger is that we may let victory go to the Communists by default.

Let us take a look at the facts. In the five years prior to 1955, the Soviet Bloc exhibited at 122 Trade Fairs at which the United States was not represented. Their first shock was at Damascus, last year, where they had a $500,000 exhibition. Awakening in time to what was happening, the United States was a last minute entry, presenting as one of its official exhibits the film CINERAMA. The picture was the hit of the fair. It stole the entire show. The Communists protested violently, and when they heard the United States was planning a repeat performance at Bangkok, they withdrew entirely. They couldn't take the competition.

Since that date, the USSR has withdrawn from at least five other fairs in which it was announced that the United States would exhibit, the Lyons International Fair and the Milan Sample Fair in April of this year, the Paris International Fair and the Tokyo International Fair in May, and the Canadian International Trade Fair in Toronto this month.

Under the program made possible during the current year by the President's $5 million Emergency Fund, the United States will have been represented at 15 fairs by July 1, 1955.

These fairs have given us opportunity to refute Communist sneers at the "myth" of the American way of life. The Frankfurt Fair, March 6-10, is a good example. Commenting, a Frankfurt English-language newspaper said.... "the exhibition marked the first time that Uncle Sam has actually raised his window shades in Europe in an attempt to dispel myths and give substantial facts about how Americans live."

At Frankfurt, United States producers displayed over 300 products commonly used in the average American home. The exhibit, entitled "America at Home", featured a completely furnished full-scale five room modern American home with actors impersonating an American family. Brand names that are household words in the United States were displayed. . . Dupont, General Electric, Singer Sewing Machine, Congoleum-Nairn, Revere Ware and a host of others. Over 65 firms exhibited. The products told a significant story of a nation's economy dedicated to production for peace and abundance. Over 70,000 visitors saw that exhibit.

The Trade Information Center, manned by United States industry specialists and Department of Commerce representatives, gave over 275 personal interviews and answered inquiries by the thousands. Inquiries came in so fast that three receptionists were unable to take care of them.

The major responsibility for the exhibits in these fairs rests, of course, upon the exhibitors. The United States Government contribution is only "seed" money. But without that encouragement the participation of American business would be uncertain. And, in this cold war, we cannot afford uncertainties.

No less significant have been the results achieved under the cultural presentation program and for this, too, the President's Emergency Fund provides the "seed" money. It does not pay all expenses, but it assures American artists going overseas against too heavy losses.

That Americans are uncultured, crass, material-minded barbarians is a favorite Communist propaganda line. On the other hand, they try to present themselves as devoted to the arts, to the better things of life. For years troupes of artists from the USSR, and more recently from Communist China, have been sent abroad by their Governments to make friends and influence people for Communism. That the Russian ballet, admittedly among the best in the world, has its roots in Czarist Russia is ignored. The ballet is Communist, they say. It is a potent argument for the Marxian line. Music, art, sports-- all are grist for the Communist mills. They exploit their artists and sportsmen as they exploit everything else, and they have been doing it effectively, make no mistake about that.

These statements are borne out by no less a personality than William Randolph Hearst, Jr., editor-in-chief of the Hearst newspapers. During his recent visit to Soviet Russia Mr. Hearst had ample opportunity to observe the steps being taken by the Communists to gain support for their ideology in fields other than the military. As a result, he came back to the United States determined that the United States should not be caught off base in this particular phase of the struggle. In a speech before the National Press Club he pointed out that "the western program for building armed strength should be widened into a more flexible and imaginative strategy for competitive coexistence with Communism in every field and on every front". He went on to draw on some of his own observations saying, "While I was in Moscow I gained the impression that communism was moving ahead in many fields which the present western strategy overlooks..... By inviting to Moscow picked delegations from the satellite countries and wavering neutrals like India they strive to convey the impression that Soviet customs are superior to those of the West.... (Therefore) we should seek to convey to the world-to our allies, to the uncommitted countries especially, and to the Russians if possible - the idea that America is not only proud of its motor cars, its bathtubs, and other material benefits, but also of its cultural achievements". The legislation under consideration here today would do much in the future to convince other peoples of our interest in cultural affairs as it has done in the past.

Under the President's program, policies and procedures for the United States cultural offensive are now fully established and in active operation. As of May 19, I am informed, 23 projects are underway. I do not propose to discuss each of these projects in detail, but will touch upon several by way of illustration.

Those of you who have listened to the NBC Symphony of the Air will not be surprized at the success of its present tour of the Far East. At its stop in Manila, the Filipino newspaper, Sunday Chronicle, made mention of the Communist charge that the tour was a propaganda move. Said the writer ... "if this is so, then we can afford to have more of it...this is propaganda we would go out of our way to welcome...it is propaganda that will really sell the United States anywhere, be it Europe or Asia."

The Orchestra's 21-day stop in Japan was a smash hit. The New York Times quotes a review in the English language edition of Osaka Mainichi: "As the symphony was brought to the grande finale, the crowd who sat in an ecstasy of tonal splendor, knew no end of jolly."

A "Salute" to France is one of the big projects under way this year under this program. The chief financial burden has been assumed by private sponsors but the "seed" money from the Fund is extending its scope throughout Europe and the Near East. The "Salute" now under way includes both music and the drama as well as paintings.

The Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Eugene Ormandy, opened the festival on May 19th. Reviews in the French press used such expressions as "great music making", "exquisite", "iridescent", "ravishing".

Last week, the New York City Ballet followed upon the orchestra's heels. Still to come on the "Salute" schedule is "Oklahoma", and later, in conjunction with a Dramatic Arts Festival, performances of "Medea" and "The Skin of Our Teeth".

The nine weeks tour of the Balkans and Mediterranean area of "Porgy and Bess" has been another cultural triumph for the United States. On the opening night in Zagreb, the company received 14 curtain calls, and on closing night there was a half-hour ovation.

Not only in Yugoslavia, but elsewhere, this was, for many people, the first time they had seen negroes. Having heard so much Communist propaganda, they were astounded to learn that most of the cast are college graduates. These are not the negroes of Communist propaganda. Each individual member of the cast has been an Ambassador for this country. Plied everywhere with questions, they are handling the situation with a dignity and intelligence of which every American can be proud.

In the sports field, the program includes tours by stars in the Pan American games. Three such teams have already gone out. Their success has been on the level of those I have just listed.

All of the projects undertaken in this program have been planned with the specific interests in mind of the areas to which the traveling artists and athletes are sent. The projects, handled in this country by the State Department, are publicized overseas by the U. S. Information Agency. In all cases, the events are being used by all Agency posts in the various countries as the nucleus of a public information campaign to create recognition and appreciation of the cultural achievements of the United States.

In my own opinion, trade fairs and cultural activities are areas of the cold war which the United States cannot neglect. And, as I have said, both are fields in which we can have full confidence of success. It is only a question of taking advantage of the opportunities afforded us.

Communist goods exhibited at trade fairs have often been of inferior quality - but how are other peoples to know that if there are no United States exhibits to make the contrast clear? In the absence of first-rate Western participation, the Communists have been winning by default.

In the cultural field it is, again, only a question of giving these other peoples an opportunity to see, listen, and judge. Here, again, we HAVE the goods. The best rebuttal of Communist charges is to produce them. In closing may I refer once more to Mr. Hearst. In the speech from which I quoted earlier he spoke words of great import to all of us here today: "One side or the other is going to win the battle of coexistence. - It had better be our side. - Everyone and everything we love and cherish is at stake."

I urge the Committee to support these tremendously important activities and to grant the funds necessary to carry on and expand them during the coming fiscal year.

I would appreciate it very much, Mr. Chairman, if you would include in the hearing record at the conclusion of my statement some material which shows the tremendous response which these programs have received abroad.

Thank you very much.

ARCHITECTS' STUDY FOR CIVIC CENTER—This study for a design for a civic center in the Capital was made by the architectural firm of Eggers & Higgins, which designed the National Gallery of Art. Robert W. Dowling of New York, member of the commission being set up to plan the projected civic center for Washington, said this study was made several years ago when a similar project was under discussion. He stressed that it has no official standing in the present plans.

Funds for Auditorium Available, Official Says

By FRANCIS P. DOUGLAS
Star Staff Correspondent

NEW YORK, Sept. 17.—Robert W. Dowling, member of the commission being formed to plan a civic auditorium for the Capital, is confident $15 million can be raised for the project.

This money would be in outright donations. It would make unnecessary planning the financing of the structure on a self-liquidating basis, as directed by Congress.

"If the Federal Government donates the land," he said "it should do it contingent on the money being raised and it should set a time limit," Mr. Dowling said. "I think there ought to be a two-year restriction."

He said the money can be raised on a Nation-wide basis from individuals, the foundations, the theater—"it could raise a great sum through benefit performances"—the moving picture industry and other groups.

Experienced Fund Raiser

Mr. Dowling takes time from business—big business—for an enthusiasm for the theater. And he knows about raising money. He is engaged in the real estate and building business in New York. He is president and director of the City Investing Co., and a director of Starrett Brothers & Eken, the largest in their fields. He is director of almost a dozen other companies. His interests control the National Theater, the Playhouse and the Dupont Theater in Washington.

He is chairman of the American National Theater & Academy (ANTA). This is a nonprofit foundation chartered by Congress in 1935 to promote the American theater. It is in charge of this country's international exchange program which sends American plays like "Porgy and Bess" overseas.

When the French government suggested last summer that the United States stage an American Festival of Arts in Paris, the State Department accepted. But there was no money for the project. Mr. Dowling raised the necessary $400,000 through private subscriptions. The American program in Paris included the presentation of Thornton Wilder's "Skin of Our Teeth," with a top-notch cast.

Interest Longstanding

Mr. Dowling's interest in an auditorium for the Capital is of a number of years standing. He testified in favor of the bill setting up the commission to plan a civic auditorium, to include an inaugral hall of the Presidents and a music, fine arts and mass communications center.

It was natural that the seven members named to the commission by Speaker Rayburn should include Mr. Dowling. Vice President Nixon named seven members Friday and announcement of President Eisenhower's seven appointees is expected shortly.

The law specifies that the commission shall report by next February 1. Mr. Dowling believes that allows plenty of time.

"There is no mystery involved," he said. "It is not like splitting the atom or launching a satellite. An auditorium can be established using the arts and skills already developed."

He suggested that the auditorium should seat 4,000, but said that is something for the commission to work out. He mentioned it as a "fair guess," just as he had mentioned $15 million as "not an exact sum, but a good start."

Accordion Plan Favored

Of the auditorium he said:

"I should like to see it built on what I would call the accordion plan—an auditorium seating 4,000 one night and contracting to seat 1,000 the next night, with no vacant seats. It is of enormous importance always to have the room full.

"This accordion plan is entirely practical. It can be accomplished in either of two ways. One is by movable walls. The second is by movable drapes suspended from ceiling tracks.

"In the case of the walls, they could either be raised from the floor or, again, suspended from ceiling tracks.

"The hall should be fitted to the performance. You could have a magnificent chamber music concert but in a big hall the three or more players would be like flies on the distant stage. For a full-scale opera or ballet you would want the entire hall."

Not Just Theater

He dismissed the idea that the auditorium should be for the theater alone. He said it could be used for important meetings of state, for international meetings, and to provide a chamber for the inauguration of Presidents, as the law contemplates.

The building, he said, should also provide facilities for schools of music, the drama and painting and it could become a great center in those fields. This would help in raising money, he pointed out, because some give more quickly to education than to other purposes.

In the auditorium he would like to see 50 boxes, probably more. He explained there should be a presidential box and suggested a box named for each State in which the Governor of the State or the State's representatives would be welcome.

Discussing the need for the building he said many factors are obvious but some are not so obvious.

"When we send abroad an exchange program, exchange is a misnomer if we can't receive something here in return. These have been making friends for our country. But then artists, producers, musicians ask when they can come here.

No Theater Available

"There is no commercial theater you can book them into in midseason. Every New York theater manager hopes to book his house for a whole season. With the exception of the National in Washington, where you might find a couple of weeks in the winter, there is no other place to play. New York is practically closed.

"You just have to have an adequate house, not only for the theater, but for ballet, opera, concerts—all the performing arts need it.

As fars Mr. Dowding is concerned the site is an open question. Asked about a site on the L'Efant Plaza in the projected Zeckendorf development of Southwest Washington, Mr. Dowling said a consideration would be what other buildings—"assets of national importance"—would form the surroundings.

Parking, he said, should be an important consideration in the site selection. "We want this to be a theater of the people," he said, stressing that parking facilities must be available.

Suggestions were made initially that the building should include a big convention hall. Mr. Dowling thought this would be a mistake. It would put Washington in competition with other cities which seek big conventions. He would rather, he explained, keep the building to the "field of culture and artistic achievement."

He saw no hurdle in the way of working out an acceptable manner of control. The building might be under the National Park Service, he suggested. Or it might be administered by a board of trustees similar to the board which administers the National Gallery of Art. Some day, he speculated, there might be an American counterpart to the ministers of culture of other countries and the center would be in his department.

Illustrating Mr. Dowling's long-time interest in such a project here is an incident which occurred more than five years ago. He and Belvins Davis, producer of "Porgy and Bess," came to Washington and proposed a civic auditorium to President Truman.

FOR RELEASE MONDAY, SEPTEMBER 19, 1955 September 16, 1955
FROM THE OFFICE OF CONGRESSMAN FRANK THOMPSON, Jr. (D.N.J.)
TRENTON, N.J.

The aftermath of the recent flood continues to be of great concern to all of us charged with handling relief measures. The decision to replace the washed-out Yardley bridge with a one-way span was one to which I immediately expressed strong opposition. It was clear to me that unless a two-way span was erected, the fears regarding traffic congestion expressed by users of the bridge, as well as merchants and other businessmen, would materialize.

The traffic congestion would obviously be a tremendous headache to thousands of people. The Army Engineers' desire to save money by installation of the one-way span seemed based on a very narrow concept. The overall economic loss to business and working people, over a long period of time, would be almost immeasurable.

With this fact in mind, a conference between the Army Engineers and other interested officials was called to attempt to affect a change in plans. I know I am not alone in experiencing a great feeling of relief over the ultimate decision to erect the two-way span.

The Government Operations Committee will hold hearings at Pocono Manor, Pennsylvania next week and I am planning to make a strong statement on flood control. If the Lehigh Valley project, which has been authorized, had been completed, the crest of the flood would have been three feet lower in Trenton.

I feel that the Flood Insurance proposition which Sen. Lehman and I will introduce when Congress reconvenes is a fine idea, but after all, no insurance would be necessary if the Delaware was controlled as it should be. Our people would rather never see the water in their homes again, even if they could survey the mess and say, "It's horrible, but at least we're insured." I'm for flood control as I am for a deeper Delaware.

ORCHESTRA LEADER KEARNS

N.B.

Drew Pearson's column reported on September 12th that Rep. Carroll D. Kearns of Pennsylvania, a leader in the fight for public school construction in the Congress, has three opponents in the GOP Primary whose chief campaign issue seems to be that Kearns spends too much time on music and trying to establish a cultural center in the Nation's Capital.

Well, Rep. Kearns is a member of the Congressional Committee that favorably reported my bill to establish a civic and cultural center in Washington which 15 Members of the House and Senate joined me in introducing. The President, who prides himself on being an amateur painter like Winston Churchill, signed the bill into law on July 1st. Together with the Vice-President, he will, in the immediate future, name 14 members to the Commission which the law established.

The Russians for years have been spending huge sums on cultural propaganda to prove we are a nation of materialistic barbarians, and Kearns' primary opponents seem intent on proving the Russians are right.

At the request of Secretary Dulles, Kearns conducted the Air Force Band and Orchestra on a tour of Iceland, Denmark, Norway and Germany, and gave the communists in those countries a taste of some real pychological warfare. They are still trying to square Kearns' appearance with the official line that we are cultureless money-chasers.

Pennsylvania's Republicans are expected to view with disfavor the strictly phony claims of the GOP Primary aspirants and live up to that State's great traditions developed by the Bethlehem Choir, the University of Pennsylvania School of Music, the Curtis Institute, the Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra, the famous Erie Little Theater in Kearns' 24th District, the 150-years-old Pennsylvania Academy of Fine Arts, the drama departments of Pennsylvania State College, the Carnegie Institute of Technology, the University of Pittsburgh, and other distinguished cultural groups too numerous to mention which are among Pennsylvania's chief adornments. Another Pennsylvanian, Andrew Mellon, founded the National Gallery of Art in Washington, one of the greatest cultural monuments in the Western world.

agreements the Reds had ever entered into. Hungary, true to her word, declared war on Germany on January 20, 1945. But the Reds forgot about their promises to arm the Hungarians so they could defend themselves. Instead, they turned to subverting the government to their own purposes.

Of the 16 independent nations now under Red rule, only 2 of them ever had any effective native Communist Party. Eleven of the governments were deposed by force, and 4 were ousted by ultimatum.

These examples of bad faith which occurred before World War II have been completed overshadowed by the treaties and agreements broken by the Soviet Union since the war. For most of these agreements were made with the United States.

Specifically, they include the Yalta agreement, the Potsdam agreement, the agreement on the Allied Control Commission which was set up to operate in Hungary, Bulgaria, Rumania; peace treaties with these three nations; the Cairo Declaration, which was also reaffirmed at the Potsdam Conference; the Declaration of Teheran, the China-Soviet Union Treaty of 1945, and even the Soviet-Iranian friendship agreement of 1921.

Iran was forced to go to the United Nations Security Council to protest against the Soviet Union's violation of her territorial integrity. This basically was a violation of the United Nations Charter itself.

It should be obvious today, on the basis of their record that any proposal made by the Soviets at Geneva will be broken when the Kremlin feels it expedient to do so.

During the 1930's, when Hitler was gathering strength, the Kremlin encircled Germany with a pattern of nonaggression and mutual security pacts. Every one of them were broken, Albania, Bulgaria, Czechoslovakia, Hungary, Poland, Rumania, Lithuania, Latvia, and Estonia are now behind the Iron Curtain. As a matter of fact, so is Korea above the 38th parallel.

Since the end of the war, the Soviet Union has violated treaties, obligations and agreements 14 times in Germany, 12 times in Hungary, 10 times in Rumania, 7 times in Austria, 6 times in Iran, 5 times in Korea, 3 times in Manchuria, once in Japan, and another time in Poland.

Every one of these violations affected the lives, well-being, and freedom of millions of people. It is a cruel and heartless record. It is a record which we should not only study carefully but well remember.

Bananas on Pikes Peak or Good Land in Michigan?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CRAIG HOSMER

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 13, 1955

Mr. HOSMER. Mr. Speaker, the Department of Agriculture reports there are more than 20 million acres of undeveloped fertile land in the humid areas of the United States which can be developed by low-cost drainage.

Of this total, Michigan has more than 690,000 acres waiting to be brought into agricultural production, when and if needed.

The cost would be from $60 to $100 an acre.

But it would cost the taxpayers of the Nation at least 50 times as much for each acre developed in the proposed multibillion-dollar upper Colorado River project.

The Congress might as well appropriate money to grow bananas on Pikes Peak as to approve the upper Colorado River project.

New Link, Los Angeles to Europe

OF

HON. DONALD L. JACKSON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 18, 1955

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. Speaker, the city of Los Angeles was delighted last year when Scandinavian Airlines System began flying from Los Angeles to Europe over the Polar Route. As you know, flying time between the West Coast of the United States and Europe is substantially reduced by operating over this route rather than transcontinently with a change of planes in New York.

I am delighted to learn that Pan American World Airways has applied to the Civil Aeronautics Board to duplicate the Scandinavian Airlines System service and fly from Los Angeles to Europe "over the pole." It is imperative that United States airlines flying in the international field keep pace with their foreign competition. Unlike their foreign competitors, American lines are privately owned. Their competitors from abroad are invariably owned by their governments which feel that national prestige dictates that they have a strong civil air transport system.

Prompt approval by the Civil Aeronautics Board of Pan American's application to fly this new and revolutionary route to Europe is desired by the city of Los Angeles.

Mr. Speaker the Los Angeles Examiner of June 7 carries an editorial which clearly points out the benefits which will accrue to Los Angeles and Southern California by prompt certification of Pan American on this route. Under leave to revise and extend my remarks, I include this editorial in the RECORD:

NEW LINK, LOS ANGELES TO EUROPE

American-flag carriers hope soon to compete directly with foreign airlines now using, or about to use, the "over the pole" great circle route between western America and the Old World.

Application to this effect by Pan-American World Airways is now before the Civil Aeronautics Board.

At present, Scandinavian Airlines System exclusively operates this route.

Pan-American's application includes Los Angeles as terminal for its projected transpolar run.

At the same time, Canadian airlines expect to start operations on the some route within a few weeks from Vancouver, B. C.

British Overseas Airways is preparing to follow suit.

There is no reason whatever why this increasingly important air lane between western America and Europe should remain even temporarily a foreign monopoly. International comptition is not only healthy, but necessary in developing and exploiting new airways.

And it is unthinkable that in this process, American airlines should not immediately become participants and leaders.

Pan-American, with new equipment soon to be delivered, promises to outspeed foreign rivals. Present plans call for 18-hour flights to London from Los Angeles.

The value of this new service to southern California is obvious. But not more so than its value to American aviation.

The President Declares That Freedom of the Arts Is a Basic Freedom, One of the Pillars of Liberty in Our Land

OF

HON. FRANK THOMPSON, JR.

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 18, 1955

Mr. THOMPSON of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, recently there appeared in most of the New York newspapers an editorial signed by Huntington Hartford, heir to the A. & P. fortune under the title "The Public Be Damned?"

The advertisement attacked American art criticism, abstract art, the contemporary theater, art dealers and museum officials, and the public. Mr. Hartford's editorial reached millions of readers and cost some $25,000. In an interview with Paul Mocsanyi, art critic for the United Press, Mr. Hartford said:

I'll deduct the money from my income tax.

He also told Mocsanyi regarding the advertisements that—

They won't cost me anything, of course.

In an editorial in the Arts Digest for July 1955 the editor and publisher, Jonathan Marshall, atempts to answer Mr. Hartford's attack. Among other things, he says—

Although we doubt whether the author wants to be a dictator or censor of art, he is calling for such a dictatorship. Perhaps we would be more accurate if we said that the demand appears to be for a vigilante group. This group might police studios, galleries, and museums—and, of course, the art schools—and would protect us from that which is obscure and from our own imaginations.

There is no need to define art here or to take a stand behind any type of art. We believe that every artist has a right to create as he desires, for the market can be his judge and the public has a free choice. Mr. Hartford can look at whatever paintings he chooses, as can the clerk in an A & P store; as can you. But this does not give any of us the right to say artists must paint in this way or that, as if there were only one right way of doing it. "It must be understandable and beautiful to me to be good," is what Hartford erroneously implies.

In his message congratulating the Museum of Modern Art on its 25th anniversay, President Eisenhower declared that—

There is an important principle which we should ever keep in mind—the principle that freedom of the arts is a basic freedom, one of the pillars of liberty in our land.

The position taken by the President is, indeed, basic to our freedoms. New ideas and experimentation are essential to art and to democracy. We must guard our freedoms jealously, for it is these very freedoms that differentiate our form of government from communism, naziism, and fascism. It can be doubted that Mr. Hartford has thought through to the inevitable conclusion the course which he is recommending.

The editor of the Arts Digest concludes his statement by asking the following question which also seems to me to go to the heart of the problem: "Can funds used for these purposes be truly called educational and remain tax exempt? We hope that the Bureau of Internal Revenue will look into the matter."

The editorial from the Arts Digest follows:

"THE PUBLIC BE DAMNED?"—NO

(By Jonathan Marshall)

While we were at press for the June issue a full-page advertisement, titled "The Public Be Damned?" appeared in most daily New York newspapers. Signed by Huntington Hartford, heir to the A. & P. fortune, the ad has created a great deal of misgiving and anxiety in art circles. We feel that Hartford's blast was an ill-disguised attack on artistic freedom and set a dangerous precedent.

In brief, the advertisement attacked American art criticism, abstract art, the contemporary theater, art dealers, and museum officials, and the public. Hartford said, "It is * * * unfortunate that the art-loving public is not required to pay * * * to spend an evening looking at paintings * * * their reaction might be fully as vociferous as that of theatergoers, and the art critics might wake up to the true value of their wares." In case the self-styled art critic does not know, we are delighted to inform him that one of his prime targets, the Museum of Modern Art, charges admission and its attendance has been steadily rising. Most museums have paying members, and memberships continue to grow. We might also point out that paintings sell for far more than the price of a theater admission.

Mr. Hartford carefully selected his out-of-context quotations, and his article, for that is what it was, reached millions of readers. It costs some $25,000 to reach the public which, in reality, he damns, but the A. & P. heir apparently is not worried. In an interview with Paul Mocsanyi, art critic for the United Press, he said, "I'll deduct the money from my income tax." Prior to that he had said to Mocsanyi, "They won't cost me anything, of course."

We feel that it is a dangerous precedent for wealthy individuals to attempt to buy public opinion. It is especially dangerous when they invade a field in which their experience is limited. This is not to say that either artists or critics are above criticism, for they usually welcome it. But when one man spends thousands of dollars to proclaim that "The purpose of great art * * * is a moral one" and tells us that unless a painting has easily recognizable beauty it is not art, we must question his motives.

We doubt whether Mr. Hartford was frightened by an abstract painting as a child. Instead we wonder whether he is merely afraid of that which he does not understand. This fear often underlies the attacks on creative freedom which have taken place since the days of primitive man. Unfortunately it is easier to ridicule through laughter, or attack with platitudes, than it is to study and be openminded.

Huntington Hartford reveals himself in several places in his article. First he says, "I am frankly bitter against those who encourage obscurity in painting." This is amplified by the statement that "recognizable subject matter is indispensable to painting." And finally he says, "I believe the diseases which infect the world of painting today—of obscurity, confusion, immorality, violence—are not confined either to this single art or even to the arts in general. These are the diseases which, if the disaster of dictatorship ever overtakes our fair country, will be a major cause of it, and since the germs exist in such a pure, unadulterated form in the real of painting * * * I suggest that it is time we * * * do something about it." The latter statement is nothing less than a call for the censorship of art.

Although we doubt whether the author wants to be a dictator or censor of art, he is calling for such a dictatorship. Perhaps we would be more accurate if we said that the demand appears to be for a vigilante group. This group might police studios, galleries, and museums—and, of course, the art schools—and would protect us from that which is obscure and from our own imaginations.

There is no need to define art here or to take a stand behind any type of art. We believe that every artist has a right to create as he desires, for the market can be his judge and the public has a free choice. Mr. Hartford can look at whatever paintings he chooses, as can the clerk in an A. & P. store; as can you. But this does not give any of us the right to say artists must paint in this way or that, as if there were only one right way of doing it. "It must be understandable and beautiful to me to be good," is what Hartford erroneously implies.

New ideas and experimentation are essentials to both art and democracy. We wonder how Mr. Hartford can reconcile his professed love of democracy with his call for standardization of art and elimination of imagination. Those who desire to interpret from an artist's so-called obscure painting are entitled to do so, and we think that the real art enthusiast will continue to choose without Mr. Huntington Hartford.

Two questions remain that we cannot answer here. Why did the great New York newspapers accept this advertisement by an untrained critic attacking the integrity and competence of trained leaders in a professional field? And can funds used for these purposes be truly called educational and remain tax exempt? We hope that the Bureau of Internal Revenue will look into the matter and that the newspapers in question will have the courage to decline advertisements in future when they are in reality attacks on artistic freedom.

Another Reason for Not Building the Upper Colorado River Project

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CECIL R. KING

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 18, 1955

Mr. KING of California. Mr. Speaker, The dams are needed only to subsidize the irrigation projects. The sole purpose for including the giant power dams in the bill is to provide power revenues to subsidize 88 percent of the cost of the participating irrigation projects. The dams are first and foremost big "cash registers" for the landowners to be served by the irrigation projects. Their revenues would not benefit the whole Nation, but only these favored few residents of Colorado, Utah, New Mexico, and Wyoming.

Glen Canyon Dam, by far the largest in the chain of four, is located so far downstream that none of the water to be stored in it will be used to irrigate the participating projects.

The Interior Department admits that for at least 25 years the dams will not be needed for river regulation. The facts show that upper basin development will not require these storage units for river regulation for up to 50 years and probably longer.

The dams cannot be justified because of a need for power in the upper Colorado region. Steam power could be produced more cheaply by using the region's vast coal reserves.

The sole function of the dams for at least 50 years will be to provide revenues from the sale of power to pay for the participating projects, if, in fact, the power can be sold at the contemplated 6-mill rate, which is doubtful.

Who Doctored the Record?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHET HOLIFIELD

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 18, 1955

Mr. HOLIFIELD. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following from the St. Louis Post-Dispatch of July 11, 1955:

WHO DOCTORED THE RECORD?

Whatever may have been the propriety of Adolphe H. Wenzell's serving on both sides of the table in the Dixon-Yates deal, his testimony before the KEFAUVER subcommittee makes two things very clear indeed.

First, it is clear that somebody in the Budget Bureau and in the Atomic Energy Commission undertook to conceal Mr. Wenzell's role in the Dixon-Yates negotiations.

Last August, in order to answer criticism of the contract and to fulfill President Eisenhower's directive that all facts pertaining to it be made public, these two agencies released to the press elaborate chronologies which purported to show the record of every conference and every document dealing with the subject.

Nowhere in these documents was Mr. Wenzell ever mentioned. Nowhere was it revealed that he served as vice president of the investment firm which arranged financing for the Dixon-Yates deal, and also served as a Budget Bureau consultant who sat in on the formulation of Government policies which made the deal possible.

How did it happen that the chronologies mentioned a major conference on January 20, 1954, at which Mr. Dixon with the backing of J. Wesley McAfee of St. Louis proposed to build a powerplant at West Memphis—but did not mention that Mr. Wenzell and another First Boston executive were present? How did it happen that one important conference which Mr. Wenzell attended with

AID FOR FDA

Until the Federal Food and Drug Administration stepped on the scene, Americans had none to blow the whistle on unscrupulous food and drug makers who turned out products unsafe for public consumption. Since then, however, the FDA agents have done a first-rate job of policing the food and drug industries—within the limits of their ability.

Last month, however, a 14-man citizens' survey group announced that the FDA is woefully understaffed to do the big job cut out for it. The committee, whose chairman was G. Cullen Thomas, vice president of General Mills, knew the field in which FDA works and the problems with which it must cope.

Its members urged that FDA's modest budget be stepped up threefold to fourfold in the next 5 to 10 years. Last year, Congress gave it $5,100,000. The commission urged that this sum be increased 10 to 20 percent in the new fiscal year.

Representative LEONOR SULLIVAN, St. Louis Democrat, has introduced a bill that would carry out this recommendation. In the past, Congress hasn't leaned over backward to give the FDA the money it needs to carry out its job of protecting the public. The House should give the Sullivan bill the green light it merits.

Russia Spends $2 Billion on Exporting Culture, an Amount 700 Times Greater Than the Amount Spent by the United States

OF

HON. FRANK THOMPSON, JR.

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 28, 1955

Mr. THOMPSON of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, the Russian Government has spent $2 billion on international theater exchange since the end of World War II, while the United States has spent less than $3 million.

The Senate this week appropriated the full budget estimate of $6 million for the President's emergency fund for international affairs, a step recommended by the Senate Appropriations Committee. The Senate committee, whose chairman is the great CARL HAYDEN, of Arizona in its report to the Senate urged that hereafter this item be presented in the regular budget estimate.

I join with Senator ALEXANDER WILEY, of Wisconsin, in hoping that the Senate-House conference committee will abide by the Senate's decision and provide the full budget request for the export of American culture.

I include a number of relevant articles on the success of our cultural export program to date:

[From the Saturday Review of July 30, 1955]

AMERICAN CULTURE FOR EXPORT

The conception held abroad in almost every country that the United States is undoubtedly a fabulously wealthy nation but that it lacks any of the cultural aspects of life is rapidly disappearing. That it has lasted so long has been our own fault, for until this year we have done little or nothing to put an end to it. Even a nation so enlightened as France has judged us by the motion pictures we have sent abroad, by translations of our novels, and by the more lurid aspects of American life revealed in our newspapers. Frenchmen may have admired Hollywood's lavish technique, but films have given the impression that our people live in gaudy mansions, behave like gangsters, drive around the country in enormous automobiles. Europeans may have recognized that our foremost writers deserved the acclaim they have received, but they knew the South only through William Faulkner's novels, the Middle West as it was interpreted by Sinclair Lewis and later neonaturalists, and the Far West through John Steinbeck's Grapes of Wrath.

Our first attempt to present a different aspect of American culture was launched in January by ANTA, the American National Theatre Academy, sponsored by our State Department, and hailed by President Eisenhower, who predicted that it would be of vast significance to the cause of friendship and understanding between the people of America and Western Europe. Most of the funds necessary for the project were raised from private sources. Known as Salute to France, ANTA offered a 2-month program—the theater, the ballet, the Philadelphia Orchestra, and an exhibition of 50 years of American art which drew an average daily attendance of 2,500 people.

"Salute to France" closed on July 7 after 2 successful months, headlined by Judith Anderson in her favorite role in Medea, the Rogers and Hammerstein musical, "Oklahoma, Thornton Wilder's The Skin of Our Teeth, the New York City Ballet directed by George Balanchine, and three concerts of the Philadelphia Orchestra conducted by Eugene Ormandy. This large and expensive enterprise has indeed exceeded the hopes of its founders. It was a magnificent answer to anti-Americanism, which as Robert Sherwood said "has drenched the people of Europe with propaganda, first by the Nazis and then by the Communists, an answer which says in effect, 'the Americans have money, they have power, but they are uncultured barbarians'."

"Salute to France" was conceived in June of last year. A letter had come to the attention of ANTA through diplomatic channels stating that the Minister of Fine Arts of France had suggested to Ambassador C. Douglas Dillon that in the spring of 1955 America might stage a great festival of the arts in Paris. ANTA was at the same time informed that our Government had no funds available for so expensive a project, but was asked politely if it would assume the responsibility of raising the necessary funds and directing the entire festival. The French Government offered to provide the necessary theatres, fully staffed, and without charge.

To the average American it might appear that since the United States Government has spent billions of dollars to revive the economy of many foreign nations, it might be induced to hallmark a few hundreds of thousands of dollars to continue a venture which has proved its value. Indeed, President Eisenhower in his State of the Union message to Congress last year proposed the establishment of a Federal Arts Commission to encourage artistic endeavors. "In the advancement of the various activities which will make our civilization endure and flourish," he said, "the Federal Government should do more to give official recognition to the importance of the arts and other cultural activities."

It would seem to be reasonable that, if his idea is accepted by the Government, part of the necessary funds should be used to send examples of American art and culture to every country where it would be acceptable. But whether or not his suggestion is accepted, ANTA's foreign venture in Paris and elsewhere has led to worldwide cultural efforts. The Gershwin-Du Bose Heyward operetta, after a tour in Yugoslavia, Greece, and the Near East, opened in the Municipal Theatre in Rio De Janeiro on July 9, where it was received, according to The New York Times, with "thunderous applause." It was also the greatest social event of the season. Last May the Symphony of the Air ended a triumphant tour of the major cities of Japan. According to a press report a Japanese critic wrote that he did not believe there have been any musicians from abroad "who have so successfully grasped the heart-strings of the Japanese people." Thousands of people lined up at box-offices a day in advance, sleeping on the ground wrapped in quilts. The musicians were flown to Okinawa and Korea. This was only the beginning of the Symphony's Far Eastern tour, which was extended two weeks to play in Bangkok, Singapore, Colombo, Kaula Lampur, Manila, and Hong Kong. The tour was sponsored by ANTA's Exchange Program.

A conception which has in so short a time proved that other nations, aside from Russia, are eager to know more of American culture, that they will welcome our actors, dancers, and musicians, will applaud them if they deserve it and treat them handsomely in the press, should be given every opportunity to expand and to prove once and for all time that we do not deserve the reputation of being a country without culture of any significance. The day may come when Russia and the United States will exchange their art, their drama, music, and ballet. The revelation of their different cultures may prove to be a better key to co-existence than armies and atomic weapons.

Porgy and Bess opened Sao Paulo, July 16, overwhelming success.

Quotations critics:

O Estado de Sao Paulo: "Opening of Porgy and Bess undoubtedly marked high point of the artistic season—Porgy and Bess is the true tradition of opera, born within the theater—a miracle that would not be possible without the truly exceptional technical progress of the North American theater—if some day opera should have a rebirth, critics are beginning to realize that it will be in the United States—not only an extraordinary and unforgettable spectacle but equally a work of art—everyone has something to admire and to learn in Porgy and Bess: The musician, the scenarist, the actor, the choreographer, the poet, the technician—it is for the people; it is the richest and most imaginative entertainment one could desire."

Correio Paulistano: "A marvelous spectacle."

Folha da Manha: "The (theater) Santana is living sweet moments with the Gershwin opera."

Ultima Hora: "As we expected Porgy and Bess impressed us greatly—a spectacle not to be missed."

Noticias de Hoje (columnist): "A finished production of high-technical standard, presenting good voices and interpretations, dances, and direction worthy of unrestricted applause. What is to be lamented is the fact that Gershwin did not live long enough to ripen his art and prove the feasibility of a national opera, based on the different aspects of the life of the North American people. The deep divergence and irremediable antagonism existent between these very people, anxious for emancipation, economically and politically, and the Government of the United States, openly and rigidly subordinated to the interests of imperialist capital, does not prevent our accepting in friendly fashion, an opera that, in spite of innumerable limitations, is undoubtedly an authentic work."

Press and public loud in praise of performances and Government support cultural attractions. Letter to editor Straits Times, June 23 "will the United States give us more? I wish to thank the State Department of the United States for making possible the concerts by the Symphony of the Air for the public of Singapore. It is a pity that the American flag was not displayed behing the orchestra to remind the listeners that we were all enjoying the beautiful music through the courtesy of the United States Government. If the policy of the United States is to encourage a better understanding and good will in Asia, this was one of the important steps toward the goal. We hope that this will be only the beginning of the display of American cultural progress."

Headline Singapore Standard, June 21, "School Children Listen Spellbound to Hendl's Symphony of the Air." Malaya Mail editorial June 22, "A Welcome Visit. The visit of the American symphony orchestra to Kuala Lumpur was more than being an outstanding event in the cultural life of the town and immediate area. To begin with it was a first-hand demonstration of good international relations and was evidence, if evidence is needed that in cultural as in many other directions there is more that unites us than divides us. The orchestra itself while comprising American citizens drew on a dozen or more countries of origin evidence again that those who take a fatalistic attitude toward racial problems (which can arise as easily in the West as in the East) can prove wrong. Good as it is for growing Kuala Lumpur—growing in maturity as well as size—to have a visit of the size and importance of the Symphony of the Air yet it has to be remembered that the financial implications are by no means simple. Despite the by no means trifling charges of admission to the Chinwoo on Monday night the takings will fall very short of the expenses involved and Kuala Lumpur folk who had a good evening's entertainment must not forge the substantial subsidy which came from friendly but foreign taxpayers."

Editorial "Musical History: Musical history was made in Malaya with the performances in Singapore and the Federation by the New York Symphony of the Air orchestra during their all too brief tour of this country. The ovation which this company of 92 musicians received at every concert is a tribute to their contribution to the world of music. Music lovers, and even those to whom 'high brow' music is not so palatable, came away from the concerts wishing that they could have sat and listened on and on for many more hours." BEWILDERED BY FAR EAST TOUR, HENDL SEES A RETURN POSSIBLE

SAN FRANCISCO, July 4.—Dallas Symphony Conductor Walter Hendl returned to America Sunday, weary from the pace of a 9-week Far East tour that took him some 40,000 miles with the famed Symphony of the Air, but jubilant over the reception given the orchestra throughout the Orient.

He described the enthusiasm of the symphony's Asian audiences as "almost unbelievable," adding:

"Music is a food for Asians—something they cannot seem to get enough of. In Japan, for instance, we could have played to full houses every night for a year's time. It was the same wherever we went."

NINE COUNTRIES

Hendl said that the symphony drew audiences numbering from 4,000 to 20,000 in 9 Asian countries—Japan, Korea, Okinawa, Formosa, the Philippines, Thailand, Singapore, Malaya, and Ceylon.

"Five thousand children came to hear us in Colombo, Ceylon," he said, "and some of them had come as far as 250 miles by bus.

"In Seoul, Korea, 14,000 Koreans came to hear us. Another 3,000 crashed police lines and nearly turned over my car, trying to get autographs. I had to change clothes and sneak out in disguise later. And this had to do with music, not just me. The fourth clarinet player got the same treatment."

WEST MEETS EAST

Hendl said the symphony played standard Western symphonic music throughout the Far East tour bringing it to Asian audiences for the first time in a majority of cases.

He said that in Kuala Lumpur, Malaya, for instance, a city he described as a "fabulous place—a city in the middle of a jungle"—the symphony played Beethoven, Brahms, and Tchaikovsky, "and the audience went wild."

Hendl said he was just beginning to put the Far East tour—his second in 2 years—into perspective.

POWERFUL VOICE

"But here is something I have got out of it," he said. "In the East—the Orient—the making of music is just beginning. I believe that in the 20th century the arts will establish themselves as a powerful voice in the understanding of peoples.

"In the making of music, we were friends. There was a closeness there that I believe has not been established over the diplomatic tables."

Hendl said that a return visit to Asia was very possible late in the summer, before he opens his seventh season with the Dallas Symphony, the second week in November, but the idea has not yet thoroughly jelled. He would travel alone in that event and conduct Asian symphonies.

CHAUTAUQUA NEXT

First, however, he is booked for 24 summer concerts at Chautauqua, N. Y., July 16 through August 26.

Hendl arrived at Travis Airbase, north of San Francisco, from Japan early Sunday and then motored to San Francisco where he planned to spend "at least a couple" of days. He said he had not yet made specific arrangements but would probably head eastward to Dallas later in the week.

"First," he said, "I have to get some sleep."

[From Time magazine of July 18, 1955]

SYMPHONY IN THE AIR

Back in the United States last week was a 92-man team of ambassadors to the Far East. Behind the Symphony of the Air lay a 42-concert tour of Japan, Korea, Okinawa, Formosa, the Philippines, Thailand, Malaya and Ceylon that endowed the United States with musical glory and cultural good will, and provided the indefatigable 92 with 8 weeks of experiences that will give them anecdotes for years.

They flew the 30,000 miles mostly aboard Military Air Transport Service and Air Force planes. Unpressurized cabins brought ear trouble. There was a running gag of one violinist asking his neighbor, "How did I play tonight? I couldn't hear myself." One flight, between Tokyo and Seoul, ran into a storm so Wagnerian that everyone but Director Don Gillis became violently ill. Gillis, with an oxygen tank but no mask, dashed up and down the plane spraying groaning musicians in the face with oxygen. "It may or may not have helped," he says.

UNSTUCK

Far Eastern atmospherics were punishing to Western instruments—and instrumentalists. The glued parts of viols and woodwinds regularly came unstuck; humidity snapped the strings of three violas during Beethoven's Eroica in Ceylon. The heat could untune a piano half a tone in 2 hours and rot a dress suit in a matter of days. In Bangkok, with a temperature of 105° onstage and no fans, United States Ambassador John Peurifoy came backstage to insist that the men take off their white jackets. After that they often played in shirtsleeves, delicately abandoning suspenders in favor of belts. In Manila an enthusiast presented them with sport shirts decorated with pictures of Maestro Arturo Toscanini, who trained the orchestra (as the NBC Symphony), and left in the spring of 1954.

As the tour progressed, the musicians, in Panama hats, sport shirts, and shorts, began to look less and less like a symphony orchestra. Most of them bought cameras and camera equipment in the PX's; some went about festooned with 3 cameras. So avid was the search for souvenirs that the airplane pilots would kid them: "Just tell us the next time you guys are going to buy another 2,000 pounds of stuff so we can get lighter by feathering the props."

CONVERTED

Everywhere the reception was enthusiastic—even from people who had never heard live Western music, e. g., the Okinawans, who kept moving their heads to see where each new sound was coming from. In one community, between Kobe and Osaka, Conductor Walter Hendl, 38, stepping outside between numbers for a breath of air, discovered hundreds of Japanese who had been unable to get in standing with their ears pressed to the wall.

"I'm going back," said Pianist Hendl last week. "Probably before the end of this year I'm going back by myself. Whatever I am capable of contributing to Eastern culture in the way of Western music, I want to contribute. The tour we just concluded clearly affirms something I've always believed: that the greatest of music, which transmits the greatest of human messages, is understood everywhere."

Wheat or Controlled Acreage for Feed and Seed Purposes

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROBERT D. HARRISON

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 28, 1955

Mr. HARRISON of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I include letters of Secretary Ezra Taft Benson and Mr. Peterson relative to growing wheat on controlled acres for the purpose of feed and seed without being subject to the penalty provisions of the present agriculture act:

SECRETARY BENSON ISSUES STATEMENT ON WHEAT QUOTA VOTE

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
Washington, June 26, 1955.

Secretary of Agriculture Ezra Taft Benson today issued the following statement concerning the action of wheat growers in approving marketing quotas on 1956 production in the national referendum of June 25:

emerging as a symbol of the resurgence of Coney Island. Ground was broken October 24, 1954, for the first portion of the structure—a $1,500,000 segment of the $10,000,000 ultimate building.

The aquarium—replacing the old one at the Battery which was closed October 1, 1941, to make way for the Brooklyn-Battery Tunnel—is a joint undertaking of the New York Zoological Society and the Parks Department. The section now being built is slated for completion in the early summer of 1956.

Also being built is a pedestrian ramp that Coney visitors may use to walk from the reconstructed West Eighth Street station of the B. M. T. Subway to the aquarium.

Zoning, drafted by the city planning commission under the leadership of Chairman John J. Bennett, is the key to many of the changes taking place at Coney Island. Through a new zoning pattern, new housing there is being encouraged. Honky-tonks are being confined to the traditional amusement area.

New housing is taking advantage of the welcome mat. A 634-apartment Gravesend Houses—a public-housing project—is already in operation for low-income tenants.

The City Housing Authority is building a 534-unit Coney Island Houses for middle-income families. One more public-housing project is in sight—the 1,200-apartment Luna Park Houses is slated to rise on the site of the burned-out amusement center, Luna Park, near West Eighth Street.

POPULATION IS GROWING

The population of the Flatbush-to-Coney Island region grew from 604,203 persons in 1930 to 796,300 persons at the end of 1954. Included in these figures was a white population that went up from 600,798 in 1930 to 787,300 in 1954, and a nonwhite population that grew from 3,405 in 1930 to 5,800 last year.

In the 25-year period Puerto Ricans moved into part of the area, with 3,200 living there at the end of 1954.

City statisticians estimate that 10 percent of the families in the area are in the upper-income bracket—$5,000 a year and better. Some 38,000 families reported incomes of more than $10,000. Eighty-three percent of the families are in the middle-income level, $3,000 to $5,000 a year, while 7 percent are low-income living on less than $3,000 a year.

In the last few years substantial apartment houses have sprung up in once remote territory made accessible largely by the Belt Parkway.

A majority of these have been single-building apartment houses accommodating about 100 families each. But some larger developments have sprung up. In the Marine Park area, at Gerritsen Avenue, Avenue U and Avenue W, there is Brigham Park, an 18-building cooperative housing 1,080 families.

Fred C. Trump, Brooklyn realty man, has erected Beach Haven, a 31-building private development north of the Belt Parkway and west of Ocean Parkway.

Nowhere has the spurt in housing been more dramatic than in the Sheepshead Bay territory bounded roughly by Bedford Avenue, Shellbank Creek, Avenue U and the bay itself. In 1930 this tract was largely farmland. It is now bristling with 1- and 2-family houses.

Along Ocean Avenue and in the Midwood and Flatbush areas there is a substantial amount of top middle-income housing with rentals near $50 a room a month. Flatbush now, as 25 years ago, represents good, solid almost suburban living, with many large, prosperous one-family homes still in evidence.

More and more, however, apartment buildings have invaded Flatbush. Many garden apartments have appeared not only here, but also in Bensonhurst, Bath Beach, and Coney Island.

In addition to the new developments at Coney Island, public housing already has been provided for 3,392 middle-income families in the Flatbush-to-Coney Island region. Also, 1,610 units are under construction in the area for middle-income families and 1,765 apartments for low-income families.

There are those who say that residential Flatbush has changed little over the years. In fact, Brooklyn Borough President John Cashmore recently wrote:

"From its beginning as a small hamlet more than 300 years ago, Flatbush has never failed to give expression to the spirit of good neighborliness and the Golden Rule."

Throughout the area progress has been marked in many fields. For 25 years the 1,792-acre Marine Park has been slowly emerging from a desolate tract to a filled-in play area complete with golf course, baseball diamonds, picnic groves, sitting spaces, and a boat basin. Much work remains to be done, but the long-awaited improvement is on its way.

The 394-acre Floyd Bennett Field (Municipal Airport No. 1) has been operated since May 26, 1941, by the United States Navy and other military units as a major service airfield. From 1931, when it was opened, to 1941 it was owned and operated by New York City, with sightseeing plane jaunts a specialty.

Many years ago Flatbush, the cradle of the $1 billion motion-picture industry, lost out to Hollywood.

STUDIO IS BEING REVIVED

But now the old Flatbush Vitagraph Studio at Elm Avenue and East 15th Street will relive its old glory. The National Broadcasting Co. has spent $3,500,000 to convert the sprawling structure, which in the early nineteen hundreds sheltered the beginning of big-scale movie production, into the largest in the network's nationwide chain of television studios. The studio will be used largely for color telecasting.

Two events recently occurred in this Brooklyn region, which perhaps prove that the old and wornout must go, but that the popular will endure:

1. The old Brighton Theater at Ocean Parkway and Brighton Beach Avenue, once a gay amusement spot for a now vanished race of prosperous all-summer Brooklyn beach vacationists, was demolished 4 months ago to make way for a new apartment house.

2. Nathan's Famous, Inc., on Surf Avenue near Stillwell Avenue, has been dispensing hotdogs and other resort delicacies since 1916. Last July 6 the place commemorated a milestone in its business career—it sold its 100-millionth frankfurter.

Iowa Farmers, Religious Groups, and the Boston Symphony Orchestra Aid the President in Lifting the Iron Curtain—I

OF

HON. FRANK THOMPSON, JR.

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 26, 1955

Mr. THOMPSON of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, in the New York Times of Saturday, July 23, 1955, Anthony Leviero gives President Eisenhower's proposal to lift the Iron Curtain a better chance of success in Washington than his plan for a mutual inspection of defenses. Both countries will have to tear down many barriers, real and psychological, before ideas, people, and trade can flow freely between them, according to Mr. Leviero who goes on to say, quite accurately, I believe, that the chances for freer trade with the Soviet bloc are poorer than those for an exchange of peoples and ideas, "at least until the Soviet Union gives some convincing evidence of seriousness in the search for peace."

Beginning with the historic speech which William Randolph Hearst, Jr., editor in chief of the Hearst newspapers, delivered at the National Press Club in Washington last February, there has been an increasing amount of interest among broad masses of our people in cultural interchange with foreign countries to meet the challenge of competitive coexistence with communism. This movement culminated in the President's proposals at Geneva for lifting the Iron Curtain.

I include articles from the New York Times and the Washington Star newspapers which document the interest of the American people in the success of the President's plans:

[From the New York Times of July 23, 1955]

CAPITAL ASSESSES IRON CURTAIN BID—GIVES PRESIDENT'S CULTURAL PLEA TO REDS BETTER CHANCE THAN ARMS SCRUTINY PLAN

(By Anthony Leviero)

WASHINGTON, July 22.—President Eisenhower's proposal to lift the Iron Curtain was given a better chance of success in Washington than his plan for a mutual inspection of defenses.

Nevertheless, both countries would have to tear down many barriers, real and psychological, before ideas, people and trade could flow freely between them. Observers believed that the chances for freer trade with the Soviet bloc were poorer than those for an exchange of peoples and ideas, at least until the Soviet Union gives some convincing evidence of seriousness in the search for peace.

The United States is expected, however, to accept a Soviet proposal for a world economic conference, if it is made at Geneva. In the recent 10th anniversary celebration of the United Nations in San Francisco Soviet Foreign Minister Vyacheslav M. Molotov said the time had come for such a conference "to facilitate the development of world trade."

By the executive order of the President, strict controls are maintained to prevent the sale of hundreds of items of strategic goods to the Soviet Union or its satellites and Communist China. A general revision of these controls, as officials see it, would occur only if there were a drastic improvement in East-West political relations.

However, the President and his advisers went to Geneva with comprehensive statistics on East-West trade and the possibility of increasing commerce in peaceful goods.

In anticipation of the conference, Joseph M. Dodge, special adviser to the President on foreign trade policy, called on all the agencies concerned to supply the needed data.

INQUIRIES BY INDUSTRY

Interest in more trade with the Communist countries has also been indicated by industry in its inquiries to the Bureau of Foreign Commerce of the State Department. Exporters of automobiles, producers of light machine tools and parts, manufacturers of processed food and producers of tractors and other farm machinery have been seeking the trade information.

In his 1954 report to Congress on export controls, Sinclair Weeks, Secretary of Commerce, said that in the last quarter of 1954 export licenses with a value of $10,355,000 were approved for shipments to the Soviet Union and its European satellites. This was $1,340,000 more than in the previous quarter, and $2,043,000 more than the last quarter of 1953.

In the realm of ideas and people some of the barriers are just as concrete as the embargo on strategic goods. The Soviet Union has been turning a smile to the West since Nikita S. Khrushchev became dominant in the Kremlin. Westerners, by comparison with the Stalin era, are now swarming over the Soviet Union under a liberalized visa policy.

Russians are free to come here, too, but they must submit to fingerprinting. This requirement kept a group of Soviet school editors from coming here. It is true, American officials were somewhat suspicious about some of the editors when they learned that some were in the 40-year-old bracket. Student editors in this country range in the twenties.

The fingerprinting requirement was dropped to admit the Russian farmers who are having a bourgeois good time in Iowa. That was done by the Government's winking at the law and admitting them as officials who along with diplomats and United Nations representatives are exempt from the fingerprinting requirement.

Only Congress can do way with this requirement, and it is unlikely to do so in its present mood, because it is a provision of the Immigration and Naturalization (McCarran-Walter Act.

The exchange of people, if present mutual visiting means anything is expected by officials to go a long way toward mutual understanding and easing of tensions, Russian farmers gulping ice cream sodas and being feted by chambers of commerce in the Middle West, stronghold of American conservatism, are being accepted as people rather than as Russians.

And similarly well-dressed American farmers, asked in disbelief to show their callouses to Ukranians to prove they live by the soil, are giving Russians a more wholesome understanding of Americans.

The big hit made by the American chess team in Moscow is also viewed as a measure of how easy understanding may be achieved.

JAMMING VOICE OF AMERICA

But the Kremlin still keeps an electronic curtain around the Soviet Union in an effort to keep the message of the Voice of America from getting through. It is reported here that an estimated 1,000 jamming units are operated in the vicinity of Moscow in the costly effort to swamp the Voice.

The Soviet Union still severely restricts the admission of United States books and periodicals while the Post Office Department here has been intercepting and withholding printed materials from the Soviet bloc that it deems to be propaganda.

Both countries still strictly limit the movements of the other's diplomats. In reprisal for long-existing Soviet restrictions, the United States earlier this year listed large areas of the United States that were proscribed, as far as Soviet representatives were concerned. The State Department informed Moscow we were ready to relax the restrictions any time the Russians did the same.

RUSSIANS IN IOWA

(By Harrison E. Salisbury)

DES MOINES.—A fabulous combination—corn and hogs—has given Iowa the most successful farm economy in the world. Twelve Russians, with smiles on their faces and many questions on their lips, are trying to find the secret of how this combination works. It is the first time any of them—all important in the Soviet agricultural hierarchy—has seen the tall-corn State. And the first time most of Iowa has ever seen any Soviet Russian.

The meeting of Russians and Iowans has been somewhat more successful than in all probability either side thought it would be. Most of the Soviet delegates, including their chief, Acting Agricultural Minister Vladimir V. Matskevich, hail from the Ukraine, which is Russia's closest approximation of Iowa. Ukrainians are traditionally warm and outgoing, and the Soviet delegation is in that tradition. The result has been a spontaneous demonstration of Russian-American good feeling such as has not been seen since Churchill made the "cold war" official with his speech at Fulton, in neighboring Missouri.

The moment they hit Des Moines the Russians took off their coats, rolled up their sleeves, and, with many a wisecrack, went about seeking answers. Before they arrived a good many Iowans wondered whether they were genuinely interested in farming. After watching them clamber over farm machinery, duck under barbed-wire fences, give the hogs a familiar slap on the flanks, and sift the corn-producing soil with their fingers—as shown in these pictures—Iowans have rapidly lost their skepticism. There is no doubt: the Russian delegation is seriously interested in the business of turning corn into hogs, and particularly in why Iowans can do it so well. And Matskevich says freely he and his colleagues are intrigued by the income side of farming as well as the technology.

SYMPHONY OFFERS TO PLAY IN SOVIET—BOSTON ORCHESTRA IS EAGER TO AID IN EISENHOWER PLEA TO LIFT IRON CURTAIN

(By Howard Taubman)

LENOX, MASS., July 23.—The Boston Symphony Orchestra offered today to tour in the Soviet Union as a step toward implementing President Eisenhower's request in Geneva yesterday for lifting of the Iron Curtain.

The orchestra is planning a European trip in September 1956. It also would be willing to play in the satellite countries.

After consulting with other officials of the Boston Symphony who are here at Tanglewood, Henry B. Cabot, president of the orchestra's trustees, issued this statement:

"We welcome the President's suggestions to help remove the Iron Curtain by a cultural and intellectual exchange with the Soviet Union. The Boston Symphony Orchestra is ready and eager, if the President wishes, to be the first American orchestra to play in Moscow."

As far as the records show, no American orchestra has ever visited Russia, either in Czarist days or since the Communists took over power. A few individual American musicians have appeared there, but virtually none since the cold war started.

Mr. Cabot disclosed that in the early years of World War II, when Serge Koussevitzky, Russian-born conductor, was head of the Boston Symphony, an invitation was sent to Moscow through the State Department to Eugen Mravinsky, Leningrad conductor, to be a guest leader in Boston.

Though Mr. Mravinsky cabled that he would be delighted to come, neither the Boston Symphony nor the United States received an official reply, and he did not come.

Charles Munch, conductor of the Boston Symphony since the late Mr. Koussevitzky's retirement in 1949, expressed enthusiasm about the plan to take the Boston Symphony to the Soviet Union.

Since foreign tours by modern symphony orchestras comprising more than a hundred men take a lot of arranging, the Boston officials feel that it would not be a moment too soon to start negotiations.

The New York Philharmonic Symphony will be touring in Europe this September. But it has a full schedule and could not be rerouted to Soviet cities without canceling engagements in other European capitals.

By coincidence, an official of the International Exchange Program, which has been arranging the sending of American cultural units to foreign lands, arrived at Tanglewood today. Robert C. Schnitzer, executive secretary of the program sponsored by the American National Theatre and Academy, was here to confer with Thomas D. Perry, Jr., the Boston Orchestra's manager, about the next year's European trip.

Mr. Cabot said that should the Boston Symphony make the Soviet trip and should the Russians respond by sending an orchestra or ballet to the United States, the Boston Symphony would be glad to sponsor the performances in Boston.

[From the Washington (D. C.) Sunday Star of July 24, 1955]

COEXISTENCE PROGRAM PLANNED FOR CHURCHES

A coexistence program between Soviet and Western religious groups is underway. Some Western church leaders are hopeful the development will go beyond mere coexistence and lead to real fellowship.

Whether this hope is justified only the future can tell. Since religious leaders in the Soviet orbit are subject to the political policy of the Communists the outcome of the current trend will likely depend upon the genuineness of Russian pretensions of goodwill toward the West.

For the moment, Western Protestant and Anglican leaders are taking advantage of the new policy to promote contacts with churchmen in Iron Curtain countries, a goal which they have sought for some time. Eastern Orthodox leaders seem to be somewhat more cautious.

The outstanding development has been the 2-week visit of an 8-man delegation of Soviet church leaders of Great Britain which ended this week. Four members of the party were Russian Orthodox theologians, 2 were Lutheran bishops, and 2 Baptist leaders.

The most striking result of their visit was a tentative decision by the Orthodox theologians and representatives of the Church of England to hold a joint conference in Moscow next year. Purpose of this conference will be to discuss intercommunion between the two churches.

The decision to hold the Moscow meeting emerged from preliminary talks on intercommunion held at Lambeth Palace in London between Anglican officials and the four Russion Orthodox theologians. At this meeting an agenda for the Moscow conference was drawn up.

During their visit to England the Soviet delegation stayed at Lambeth Palace, headquarters of Dr. Geoffrey Francis Fisher, Archbishop of Canterbury.

Earlier, Metropolitan Pitirim of Minsk and Byelorussia, leader of the Orthodox members of the delegation, told newsmen he had been authorized to invite group of British church leaders to visit the Soviet Union.

Presumably, such a delegation would be selected by the British Council of Churches under whose auspices the Soviet church party visited Britain.

It was believed in London that should such a visit to Russia materialize it will coincide with the Russian Orthodox-Anglican talks in Moscow. The occasion also is expected to be utilized by other Christian groups in the Soviet Union—such as the Baptists—to discuss matters of common interest with their coreligionists in the British delegation.

Meanwhile, several delegations of Western churchmen who visited Russia reported on the state of the church there, as they saw it.

A four-man group of Dutch protestant theologians said Russian Orthodox leaders are eager to establish contacts with religious bodies outside the Iron Curtain. They reported that religion is deeply rooted in the life of the Russian people.

Seven Church of England parish priests said relations between officials of the Russian Orthodox Church and the Soviet Government can be described as "peaceful coexistence." The group reported they saw packed congregations in churches.

But a Norwegian theologian who visited Moscow and Leningrad said the great danger facing the church in the Soviet Union is that of a "museum death."

Prof. Nils Alstrup Dahl, dean of the University of Oslo, theological faculty, said there is no persecution and, within its limited sphere, the church has freedom.

"But the state has succeeded to a considerable extent in keeping the church 'on a reservation' similar to the way Indians were treated in the United States," he said. "The reservations are under the state's protection and visitors may go to them to see how well 'this special type of human being' is cared for."

Other visits by Western church delegations to Russia are in the offing. Four prominent Baptist clergymen, including three Americans, are scheduled to arrive in Moscow early in August.

Mr. THOMPSON of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, hearings are being held by the House Education and Labor Committee on a number of bills which would establish a program of cultural interchange with foreign countries to meet the challenge of competitive coexistence with communism. Primarily, these bills would make the activities being carried on under the President's Emergency Fund a permanent part of the armament of the United States during this cold-war period.

Senator JAMES E. MURRAY, of Montana, has just introduced in the Senate a bill, S. 2613, which is a companion measure to the bills being considered by the Subcommittee on Distinguished Civilian Awards and Cultural Interchange and Development of the Committee on Education and Labor of the House. The program which these bills would authorize was given great impetus by William Randolph Hearst, Jr., editor in chief of the Hearst newspapers, in a highly important speech which he delivered at the National Press Club in February of this year.

I include here a letter which I have received from Theodore C. Streibert, Director of the United States Information Agency, as well as a statement by Abbott Washburn, Deputy Director of that Agency, in support of the bills which Senator MURRAY and I have sponsored.

The letter and statement follow:

UNITED STATES INFORMATION AGENCY,
Washington, July 21, 1955.

The Honorable FRANK THOMPSON, Jr.
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. THOMPSON: Please accept my sincere thanks in behalf of the Agency for your fine work in support of the President's Emergency Fund. I am sure your interest and help were factors which led the committee to refrain from further cutting the President's request.

We hopefully anticipate restoration of the fund in the Senate Appropriations Committee and will look forward to your continuing interest when the bill returns to the floor of the House.

Sincerely yours,

THEODORE C. STREIBERT, Director.

STATEMENT BY ABBOTT WASHBURN, DEPUTY DIRECTOR, UNITED STATES INFORMATION AGENCY, PRESENTED TO THE SUBCOMMITTEE ON DISTINGUISHED CIVILIAN AWARDS AND CULTURAL INTERCHANGE AND DEVELOPMENT OF THE COMMITTEE ON EDUCATION AND LABOR OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES ON H. R. 6874

It might be helpful if I prefaced my comments with a brief remark or two about the United States Information Agency. This will show the nature of our interest in the subject matter of the bill before your committee (H. R. 6874).

As you perhaps know, the United States Information Agency is an independent Agency established by the President in August 1953, to carry on the overseas information program of the Government. Formerly this function was carried on by the State Department, but the President and Mr. Dulles felt it should be handled as an independent operation. Shortly after the Agency was established, the President issued a formal directive defining the task of the new Agency. It is a short directive and reads as follows:

"In carrying out its responsibilities in accordance with pertinent statutes and Presidential directives, the United States Information Agency shall be guided by the following:

"The purpose of the United States Information Agency shall be to submit evidence to peoples of other nations by means of communication techniques that the objectives and policies of the United States are in harmony with and will advance their legitimate aspirations for freedom, progress, and peace.

"The purpose in the paragraph above is to be carried out primarily:

"1. By explaining and interpreting to foreign peoples the objectives and policies of the United States Government.

"2. By depicting imaginatively the correlation between United States policies and the legitimate aspirations of other peoples of the world.

"3. By unmasking and countering hostile attempts to distort or to frustrate the objectives and polices of the United States.

"4. By delineating those important aspects of the life and culture of the people of the United States which facilitate understanding of the policies and objectives of the Government of the United States."

The Agency carries out this mission through a variety of means. We have some 209 information posts in 78 countries abroad, operating as an integral part of the United States diplomatic missions. Through our Voice of America facilities we broadcast all over the world. We also have an extensive library system, a press division, and a motion-picture production and distribution program.

The essence of our task is to encourage favorable attitudes toward the United States and toward our policies and objectives. One of the biggest obstacles we face in this effort is an opinion prevalent in many parts of the world that the United States is a materialistic, artistically illiterate society—that we are "cultural adolescents." Therefore, anything that is done to show people abroad that this is ont true will not only make the Information Agency's job easier but will immeasurably help the effectiveness of our country's foreign policy. Obviously the United States cannot maintain its position or fulfill its function as one of the leading nations in the world if we cannot command the respect of the nations with which we deal.

Actually, the high level of artistic, literary, and other cultural achievement in the United States is something we can all be proud of. Anything that will further raise the level of such cultural activities is all to the good. For this reason the information agency is in sympathy with the general objectives of this bill.

Whether the particular methods recommended in the part of the bill having to do with cultural development here in the United States are sound is, however, a matter on which I do not feel qualified to comment. Our job is strictly an overseas one: we do not have the competence to comment on domestic policies nor do we feel it appropriate for us to do so.

I would like, however, to comment on title I of the bill, which concerns overseas activities.

This title would authorize a continuing program for sending artists, athletes, dramatic and ballet companies, symphony orchestras, and other talented groups abroad to demonstrate our country's true cultural achievements. We in the information agency (and Mr. Nelson Rockefeller's group in the White House) believe strongly in this type of program. As you know, this has been done extensively during the past year under a special $5 million Presidential emergency appropriation. (Two million two hundred and fifty thousand dollars of this fund has been, or is being, used for cultural presentations; $2½ million for trade fairs; and the remaining $250,000 for promotion and exploitation of these events.) The administration is now seeking $6 million from the Congress for the same purposes during fiscal 1956.

The importance of a cultural program of this kind cannot be exaggerated. In recent years the Soviet Union has been putting a great deal of effort into such activities. The number of delegations into and out of the U. S. S. R. in 1954 was over 1,000—double the number in 1953. Their musicians, ballet companies, soccer teams, and other performers are journeying to all parts of the world. The Chinese Communists are also heavily engaged in this cultural offensive. The Peking Opera just a couple of weeks ago, scored a tremendous success in Paris. The number of trade fairs the Communists plan to participate in during 1955 is somewhere in the neighborhood of 65. This compares with 45 in 1954. There's no question about it. The Communists got the jump on us in this field, but under the President's emergency program we have done a great deal ourselves during the past year, and the reaction has been overwhelmingly favorable.

In the case of major projects such as the "Porgy and Bess" tour and the NBC "Symphony of the Air" concerts, the enthusiastic press reaction abroad has been unprecedented.

The impact 100 men equipped with musical instruments can have upon a whole nation's attitudes toward the United States is demonstrated by the remark of a Japanese cabinet minister on the subject of the "Symphony of the Air" as reported by an American journalist: "If America were to withdraw all their security forces from Japan, I am sure that we would defend your orchestra to the last man." On this same subject, Bob Considine recently reported in his column:

"Japan has never before been visited by a Western symphony orchestra. Every seat was sold within 2 hours of the announcement of the playing dates. For student concerts kids stood in line for as long as 30 hours.

"The men of the orchestra have created such a flood of good will and understanding of what America stands for that we have emerged in a wholly new light to tens of thousands of Japanese who considered our culture questionable.

"Mind you, this is not a propaganda deal as such. The orchestra doesn't know from propaganda, caps or lowercase. The men regard themselves merely as American musicians, playing good music as well as they can. If they have overwhelmed Japan, they are just as overwhelmed themselves. * * *

"The cost to our Government of this tour is a tiny fraction of what it pays for a single fighting plane. We buy the plane in the hope that we'll never have to use it in anger. How about buying a little more of the first, and using it more and more all over the world?"

How can we make more of these presentations possible? Unfortunately, private commercial presentations in many of those areas of the world where they are needed most are just not feasible. The box office returns and other receipts are inadequate to support the venture. In the past a few projects have been supported by the Department of State, USIA, or by private philanthropic groups. The task now is far beyond those resources, and a program of the kind contemplated by the bill before you—together with adequate appropriations—is imperative if we are to meet the challenge of the Communist cultural offensive.

While the Information Agency is strongly in favor of a continuing program of the kind authorized by the bill, the executive branch has not reached a decision as to what kind of permanent legislation is desirable. I cannot, therefore, speak for the executive branch. However, the following is our thinking on the bill:

First of all, it seems to me there ought to be something on participation in trade fairs in the same legislation. The President's emergency program embraces trade fairs as well as cultural activities. And we have scored outstanding successes at some of these fairs. Cinerama was a smash hit at Damascus. Later, at Bangkok, the Reds were scared out completely by Cinerama. The United States exhibit at Paris was outstanding, too. Such fairs give us an opportunity to show that our free system is the most productive in the world, and that we are producing primarily for peace, not war, contrary to the constant charges of Communist propaganda. The Communists, as I mentioned, have also been stepping up their activities at international fairs, trying to show that their system is more productive than the free ecenomies of the West. Incidentally, the productivity of the Soviet economy—and for that matter even the Red Chinese—while it appears second-class to us, looks wonderful to the people of underdeveloped areas. In my opinion, then, a trade-fair program ought to go arm-in-arm with any cultural program abroad. (Sports participation, by the way, is included in the cultural program.)

Secondly, any legislation ought to provide for full promotion and publicity of these activities. This is a big part of the job the Information Agency does for the President's program. We see to it that any coming visit by a United States artist or performing group, or United States representatives to a trade fair, is made known in advance to the local people. We also see to it that the performance gets full publicity over the radio, in newspapers, and magazines, etc. In this way the effect of what the United States does is multiplied many times. For every person who actually sees what the United States has brought to his country, hundreds hear about it, and hear what local critics or commentators have to say about it. This is a most important part of the program. It maximizes the results to the taxpayer of the dollars put into the President's program.

Finally, I think any legislation in this field ought to vest authority and appropriations in the President and give him broad discretion as to the precise administrative means to carry out the program. Vesting authority and appropriations in the President will make sure that the left hand always knows what the right hand is doing, that the several parts of the program work together and complement each other, and do not gradually drift apart. It will also give the program the stature that it needs and the necessary flexibility. The experience gained in the past year in operating within the framework of the President's emergency fund should be taken into consideration in setting up the legislative means to implement this important program in the future.

H. R. 7474, Utility Reimbursement

OF

HON. BRADY GENTRY

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 26, 1955

Mr. GENTRY. Mr. Speaker, H. R. 7474 contains a provision that 50 percent of the cost of relocating utility facilities necessitated by the construction of projects on the interstate, Federal primary, secondary and urban highway system may be paid from Federal funds whenever, under the laws of the States where the project is being constructed, the entire relocation cost is to be borne by the utilities.

Stated rather baldly, this means that even though a utility has made a solemn, written, legal contract with a State that it will relocate its facilities in consideration of being given the use of highway rights-of-way, or even though it has requested and accepted a franchise to enter upon highway rights-of-way as a result of a statute enacted by a State legislature by which it specifically obligated itself to relocate its facilities to permit highway improvement—this reimbursement provision nevertheless would induce a vitiation of the legal contract, a violation of the valid State law and shatter every principle of State sovereignty.

This provision in the bill might have been stated another way in complete truthfulness and frankness. It might have said that if a State has passed a law which is sound in morals and in equity; a law that is solely and completely within the police power of the States, and completely without the powers and jurisdiction of the Government; and if, under such law, solemn, written contracts have been made between the utilities and the States at the specific request of the utilities by which the utilities gained valuable rights that saved them great expense—all in consideration of their one contractual promise to relocate their facilities when necessary to permit highway improvement—then, in that event, will not you, Mr. Sovereign State, vitiate your solemn contracts, violate your valid State laws, and destroy your sovereign rights by giving the poor utilities—such as the American Telephone & Telegraph Co., Western Union, and the great electric-power companies—50 percent of their relocation costs out of this money that we have collected from your citizens, presumably to build highways, but which we now send back to you only in part.

Before considering other aspects of a provision which can result in $970 million of these road funds being given to the utilities, let us treat for a moment some of its legal aspects.

State legislatures have sovereign control over highways—a control that is ordinarily delegated to its State highway department and lesser agencies of State government. The primary use of highways is for the traveling public, but other uses that serve the public interest are generally allowed. Thus, it is generally accepted that utilities may be permitted to place their facilities on highway rights-of-way under certain considerations and restrictions—always provided, of course, that their use does not inconvenience the traveling public in its primary use. Even though a utility is allowed to do this, its rights are secondary and subordinate to the interest of the traveling public, and always remain so.

No utility ever acquires a vested right to remain in any specific location on the highway. That is true because neither the State nor its delegated agency can make any contract which impairs its police power. It is universally held that highways is a proper subject for the exercise of police power.

Every decision in courts of last resort, without exception, has held that the State, acting through its legislature, its highway department, or its local governmental units has every legal right and reason to require a utility, at its own expense, to relocate any facilities on the public rights-of-way in order to permit highway improvement. Nothing in the nature of a Federal program of highway aid alters the fact that the State, in the exercise of its police power, has every right to request the readjustment of utility facilities in order to properly serve the highway user. Federal aid to highways consists merely in the appropriation of money derived in taxes on citizens of the States, to be matched in some amount by the States, and spent on a designated system of highways, provided certain standards are met. The Federal Government does not initiate these highway projects. The States have the sole discretion of determining whether highway projects are undertaken, the nature of the project, and whether it will be financed from State funds or from both Federal and State funds.

Thus Federal participation does not prevent the State from exercising its solemn police power in connection with all its personnel, I urge swift clarification and passage of adequate measures designed to provide Reserve manpower.

Knowland Backs President

OF
HON. PATRICK J. HILLINGS
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, June 20, 1955

Mr. HILLINGS. Mr. Speaker, I wish to place in the RECORD an editorial from the Christian Science Monitor of Monday, June 20, 1955, which points up an excellent example of Senator KNOWLAND's support of the President's foreign policy.

The editorial follows:

KNOWLAND BACKS PRESIDENT

Folk who think they know where Senator KNOWLAND stands are always in danger of being surprised. Senator MCCARTHY is the latest to discover this. And he was not alone in his surprise when the Californian instantly seized an opportunity to dissociate himself from the Wisconsin Senator's attack on the Big Four Conference. For Mr. KNOWLAND has himself been active in emphasizing the dangers in negotiating with Communists.

The importance of this incident lies less in the KNOWLAND break with Mr. MCCARTHY than in the evidence that President Eisenhower will speak at Geneva with the support of congressional leaders. To state his support was doubtless the chief purpose of the Republican Senate leader. His statement did not withdraw his fears of negotiation, but rather affirmed his confidence in the President as a negotiator.

This newspaper is doubly gratified by the KNOWLAND course. Months ago it urged that he should not assume coexistence would inevitably result in successful Communist nibbling. His rebuke to Senator MCCARTHY for assuming that the summit meeting spells impending diplomatic disaster indicates he is now willing to let the coexistence policy prove itself, at least so far as it applies to Moscow. But most of all we are grateful that Mr. Eisenhower can go to Geneva knowing that he has behind him not only the Democratic but the Republican leadership in Congress.

Washington observers, always thinking in terms of politics, are suggesting that Mr. KNOWLAND has shifted his position with an eye to 1956. It is argued that he had to come to a parting of the ways with the extreme right wingers. His vote against the MCCARTHY censure and his vigorous differences with the administration over China had alined him with fading causes and separated him from many Republicans whose support he would need if he sought the presidential nomination next year.

In fairness to Mr. KNOWLAND it should be pointed out that he is a man of deep convictions, not the type of politician ruled by ambitious expediency. Many of those surprised by what they consider reversals of his position have not fully understood his thinking. Some apparent contradictions can be better understood if we note his preoccupation with the Far East. When he speaks of Communists he is thinking mainly of Chinese Communists. When he expresses fears of negotiation it is negotiation with Peking that primarily colors his thought.

The Californian warmly supported the Marshall plan, NATO and other American policies in Europe. He is not anti-British except in the Far East. So long as Formosa and the offshore islands can be kept on the back of the stove, so long as Peking does not become visibly aggressive, Mr. KNOWLAND might go a long way with Eisenhower foreign policy. If, however, talks with the Soviet are followed—as they might logically be followed—by moves for talks with China, he would almost certainly balk. But there, too, as on the MCCARTHY issue, he may find himself in danger of being isolated by the changing tide of opinion.

UNITED STATES TRADE EXHIBITS' VALUE TOLD—COLD WAR'S NEW PHASE TOLD HOUSE BY CONNIFF—HEARST AIDE WARNS OF PERILS IN COMMUNIST SHIFT

(By David Sentner)

WASHINGTON, June 14.—Frank Conniff, editorial assistant to William Randolph Hearst, Jr., today told a House Appropriations Subcommittee that the world conflict with communism had entered a new phase which might be described as the "soft war."

Conniff, representing Hearst, editor in chief of the Hearst newspapers, who is in Europe, warned that the impending competitive coexistence struggle with Red Russia might be more difficult to win than a shooting war.

"Soft words instead of threats are the new Communist weapons," he said, "and we must be prepared to counter these different tactics. Even the terminology of recent years has been outmoded.

CAN BE HARD

"But just as the cold war was a continuation of the hot war by other means, the soft war will be a form of a hard war by means other than actual combat.

"The shooting has stopped for a while but the Communists will intensify their drive for world dominance in every field and on every front."

The subcommittee, headed by Representative JOHN J. ROONEY, Democrat, of New York, was told by the witness that Hearst, after his visit to Moscow where he interviewed the four new top Kremlin leaders, had concluded there should be a more dynamic presentation of the American way of life to the world.

Conniff, who accompanied the publisher to Russia, listed the following Hearst suggestions:

Creation of a competitive coexistence council to plan strategy and tactics in the forthcoming struggle against world communism which might last into the next generation.

Carrying to the youth of the world the story of democracy and dispelling the picture of America as a sheer materialistic power.

Having our athletes and artists abroad act as goodwill ambassadors with more direct availability to students and youth groups, thereby countering the blatant propaganda activities of touring Soviet athletes and artists.

Realization that the current Russian coexistence approach was influenced by domestic difficulties faced in the Soviet Union, including desperate problems of agriculture and transportation.

URGES FUND

Representative FRANK THOMPSON, JR., Democrat, of New Jersey, another witness, urged the subcommittee to approve the requested $5 million appropriation for the Presidential emergency fund being used to support cultural missions and psychological cold warfare.

He pointed out that in the past 5 years, the Soviet bloc exhibited at 122 trade fairs at which the United States was not represented.

However THOMPSON continued, the United States awakened in time to what was happening and last year put in a last-minute entry at Damascus with an official exhibit of the film Cinerama.

HOME EXHIBIT

The picture stole the entire show despite a $500,000 Red Russian exhibition, he said. And when the Communists heard this country was planning a repeat performance at Bangkok, they withdrew entirely.

At the recent Frankfurt fair, THOMPSON testified, American producers displayed over 300 products commonly used in the average American home.

He said:

"The exhibit, entitled 'America at Home,' featured a completely furnished full-scale five-room modern American home with actors impersonating an American family. Brand names that are household words in the United States were displayed.

"These fairs have given us an opportunity to refute Communist sneers at the myth of the American way of life. Communist goods exhibited at the trade fairs have often been of inferior quality but how are other peoples to know that if there are no United States exhibits to make the contrast clear?"

[From the Washington Daily News of June 17, 1955]

WE SHOULD BE FRANK ON EXCHANGE PROGRAM

(By Eleanor Roosevelt)

NEW YORK.—Last week I received a copy of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD along with a statement by Representative FRANK THOMPSON, Jr., Democrat, of New Jersey, on the appropriation for the division of the exchange of persons in the Department of State.

The House had made a cut of $10 million in the budget request but the Senate restored the full amount of $22 million when it voted on the bill last week. Now it will have to come up again in the House and I think the people should tell their Congressmen how they feel on this subject. They should be frank to say whether they are anxious to see this program carried through in its full amount of $22 million or even increased if possible.

CANCELLATION

Everyone will acknowledge that the way to better understanding is by meeting people from other countries, so it is well to consider what would happen to this program for the exchange of people if $10 million of the estimated appropriations fund were lopped off.

First of all, this change would entirely cancel the proposed expansion of the program in the Middle East, the Far East, southeast Asia, and Africa. New programs planned for Formosa and Korea also would be wiped out. These areas of the world—where we need to understand conditions and people far better than we do and where they need to understand us—would have no exchange at all except perhaps in Egypt, where we might have a small program left.

President Eisenhower has asked Congress for $40 billion for our own and foreign military defense in 1956. If we refuse to put any emphasis on our cultural exchange between people, how can we answer the charge that the Soviets make against us when they say that we rely for too much on military power for defending freedom and for increasing understanding in the world?

HEARST SPEECH

Young William Randolph Hearst, in a speech before the Press Club in February in Washington after his return from Russia, stated that in Russia and the satellite countries sports, ballet, and the theater and literature are all shaped toward aiding communism's long-range scheme of world domination. And he added:

"Preparedness alone will not win for us the battle of coexistence. The Western program of building armed strength should be widened into a more flexible and imaginative strategy for competitive coexistence with the Communists in every field and on every front."

This is a challenge which I think should make our people suggest to their Representatives in the House that an acceptance of the $22 million appropriation voted by the Senate on May 31 would be in the best interest of our country. It would be in the interest of peace and that is the aim of all the exchange of persons and our main objective at the present time.

STATEMENT OF REPRESENTATIVE FRANK THOMPSON, JR., (DEMOCRAT, NEW JERSEY), BEFORE THE SUBCOMMITTEE ON STATE, JUSTICE, JUDICIARY, AND RELATED AGENCIES OF THE HOUSE COMMITTEE ON APPROPRIATIONS, IN SUPPORT OF THE PRESIDENT'S EMERGENCY FUND, JUNE 14, 1955

Mr. Chairman and members of the subcommittee, with funds supplied by the President's emergency fund, the United States is fighting the cold war on two new fronts. Both are important. And on both the Communists have a head start on us.

The head start, however, need not discourage us. These are both fields in which the United States has no need to worry if we exert ourselves. The only danger is that we may let victory go to the Communists by default.

Let us take a look at the facts. In the 5 years prior to 1955, the Soviet bloc exhibited at 122 trade fairs at which the United States was not represented. Their first shock was at Damascus, last year, where they had a $500,000 exhibition. Awakening in time to what was happening, the United States was a last minute entry, presenting as one of its official exhibits the film Cinerama. The picture was the hit of the fair. It stole the entire show. The Communists protested violently, and when they heard the United States was planning a repeat performance at Bangkok, they withdrew entirely. They couldn't take the competition.

Since that date, the U. S. S. R. has withdrawn from at least five other fairs in which it was announced that the United States would exhibit, the Lyons International Fair and the Milan Sample Fair in April of this year, the Paris International Fair and the Tokyo International Fair in May, and the Canadian International Trade Fair in Toronto this month.

Under the program made possible during the current year by the President's $5 million emergency fund, the United States will have been represented at 15 fairs by July 1, 1955.

These fairs have given us opportunity to refute Communist sneers at the "myth" of the American way of life. The Frankfurt Fair, March 6–10, is a good example. Commenting, a Frankfurt English-language newspaper said: "the exhibition marked the first time that Uncle Sam has actually raised his window shades in Europe in an attempt to dispel myths and give substantial facts about how Americans live."

At Frankfurt, United States producers displayed over 300 products commonly used in the average American home. The exhibit, entitled "America at Home," featured a completely furnished full-scale 5-room modern American home with actors impersonating an American family. Brand names that are household words in the United States were displayed—Dupont, General Electric, Singer Sewing Machine, Congoleum-Nairn, Revere Ware, and a host of others. Over 65 firms exhibited. The products told a significant story of a nation's economy dedicated to production for peace and abundance. Over 70,000 visitors saw that exhibit.

The trade information center, manned by United States industry specialists and Department of Commerce representatives, gave over 275 personal interviews and answered inquiries by the thousands. Inquiries came in so fast that three receptionists were unable to take care of them.

The major responsibility for the exhibits in these fairs rests, of course, upon the exhibitors. The United States Government contribution is only "seed" money. But without that encouragement the participation of American business would be uncertain. And, in this cold war, we cannot afford uncertainties.

No less significant have been the results achieved under the cultural presentation program and for this, too, the President's emergency fund provides the "seed" money. It does not pay all expenses, but it assures American artists going overseas against too heavy losses.

That Americans are uncultured, crass, material-minded barbarians is a favorite Communist propaganda line. On the other hand, they try to present themselves as devoted to the arts, to the better things of life. For years troupes of artists from the U. S. S. R., and more recently from Communist China, have been sent abroad by their Governments to make friends and influence people for communism. That the Russian ballet, admittedly among the best in the world, has its roots in czarist Russia is ignored. The ballet is Communist, they say. It is a potent argument for the Marxian line. Music, art, sports—all are grist for the Communist mills. They exploit their artists and sportsmen as they exploit everything else, and they have been doing it effectively, make no mistake about that.

All of the projects undertaken in this program have been planned with the specific interests in mind of the areas to which the traveling artists and athletes are sent. The projects, handled in this country by the State Department, are publicized overseas by the United States Information Agency. In all cases the events are being used by all Agency posts in the various countries as the nucleus of a public information campaign to create recognition and appreciation of the cultural achievements of the United States.

In my own opinion, trade fairs and cultural activities are areas of the cold war which the United States cannot neglect. And, as I have said, both are fields in which we can have full confidence of success. It is only a question of taking advantage of the opportunities afforded us.

Communist goods exhibited at trade fairs have often been of inferior quality—but how are other peoples to know that if there are no United States exhibits to make the contrast clear? In the absence of first-rate Western participation, the Communists have been winning by default.

In the cultural field it is, again, only a question of giving these other peoples an opportunity to see, listen, and judge. Here, again, we have the goods. The best rebuttal of Communist charges is to produce them. In closing, may I refer once more to Mr. Hearst. In the speech from which I quoted earlier, he spoke words of great import to all of us here today: "One side or the other is going to win the battle of coexistence. It had better be our side. Everyone and everything we love and cherish is at stake."

I urge the committee to support these tremendously important activities and to grant the funds necessary to carry on and expand them during the coming fiscal year.

Adlai's Forgotten Speech of April 11—Stevenson Wrong Again

OF

HON. PATRICK J. HILLINGS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 20, 1955

Mr. HILLINGS. Mr. Speaker, I wish to place in the RECORD an editorial which appeared in the Oroville (Calif.) Mercury of May 27, 1955.

This editorial very aptly describes how Mr. Adlai Stevenson has proved his ineptness once again insofar as our country's dealings with the Communists are concerned.

The editorial follows:

ADLAI'S FORGOTTEN SPEECH OF APRIL 11

Some military officials are said to be surprised how quickly the words Quemoy and Matsu disappeared from the front pages. They're not as surprised as Adlai Stevenson.

On April 11, Stevenson, spokesman in this country for those who favor appeasement, made an important policy address, laying down for his party the line it was expected to follow concerning dealings with China.

Stevenson advised Eisenhower to give up the offshore island in Formosa strait, forsake Chiang Kai-shek, our foremost ally in the Far East, and arrange to have Formosa neutralized. This would be a major retreat, second only to our loss of China to the Reds after we had sacrificed so much to save that country from the Japanese.

Stevenson's April 11 speech almost has been forgotten in the events that have occurred since then, for 11 days later Chou En-lai at Bandung foreswore war with the United States and announced that he would not attempt to take Formosa by force. Stevenson's followers have not mentioned his ill-advised speech, his advice to the President, since that day.

Thus was a crisis passed and our posture of strength justified.

In his address, Stevenson saw but two alternatives. He said:

"If we should withdraw under fire from the defense of these islands, we again act the 'paper tiger'; if we join in their defense we are at war, without major allies and with most of the public opinion in Asia and Europe against us."

Stevenson ignored entirely in his address the possibility that the Communists might yield when opposed by adequate strength and determination, yet that is the central theory of the Washington administration, the one upon which its foreign policy and its policy of defense have been based from the start.

Chou saw that he faced a superior in might and purpose. In some way, he had to eat his warlike words without losing too much face. He chose to adopt a new personality and he picked a new setting, Bandung. For a week he talked softly. Then to the amazement of the gathered diplomats, he issued his peace offer. He wanted to negotiate. His bluff had been called.

It would have been different had Eisenhower yielded to opposition party pressure and announced either that he would surrender the offshore islands or would fight to defend them. Had the former offer been made, the islands would have been taken at once by the Communists. Had he announced they would be defended, it would have been taken as a dare to capture them. In that situation Chou could not have backed down.

If we had followed the advice of Stevenson, we would have forced our ally to withdraw once more and his forces would have received a demoralizing blow. Then we would have entered into negotiations regarding Formosa in which we would have found our appeasement-minded allies all in favor of neutralizing Formosa, a further surrender. In that event the small nations of southeast Asia truly would have seen us as a "paper tiger."

"To act coolly, intelligently, and prudently in perilous circumstances is the test of a man—and a nation," went Stevenson's words of advice to the President. That is the way the President has acted.

Speaking of his country's Formosa policy, Stevenson said: "I shall not enlarge now upon the injury it has done us and the confusion it has wrought."

"We now face," he said, "the bitter consequence of our Government's Formosa policy * * * either another damaging, humiliating retreat, or else the hazard of modern war."

"At this late date," he said again, "there may be no wholly satisfactory way of resolving the dilemma we have stumbled into over the offshore islands. But we can learn something from the experience if we realize at last that we have been pursuing a dead-end policy in Asia."

He must hope now that what he said April 11 will not be recalled.

He overlooked the lesson of the past. We called the Communist bluff with the Berlin airlift and won. We did not call the Communist bluff when China entered the Korea war, and lost.

Our entire program has been based upon building sufficient strength to meet the enemy on his own terms. If, having achieved that strength, we continue to appease and back away, the treasure we spent to attain the strength will have been wasted.

We must not think that the President, having consented to negotiate a cease-fire and meet with Russia for high-level talks, has adopted an appeasement policy.

Had Stevenson been elected President in 1952, we would by now have been committed to the humiliating experience he advocated April 11. Mr. Stevenson is planning to run for President of the United States in 1956.

In Opposition to Pay TV

OF

HON. EMANUEL CELLER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 22, 1955

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I insert herewith the following letter I sent to the New York Herald Tribune as it was printed in that newspaper:

REPRESENTATIVE CELLER EXPLAINS WHY HE IS OPPOSED TO FEE TV

To the New York Herald Tribune:

Permit me to congratulate the New York Herald Tribune on its recent wide coverage of the pro and con of subscription television. This was, indeed, a public service. I have written to the heads of the three large broadcasting and television chains in New York City urging that they program debates and discussions on both media to bring before their vast audience all facets of this far-reaching proposal.

The proponents of pay TV continuously reassure that they have no designs on the present free TV programs. How can we be sure? How can we prevent it? On March 7 of this year it is reported that some 65 million people watched Peter Pan and that the reaction from the public and industry was most favorable.

It has been stated that it cost $600,000 to put this spectacular on the coaxials and it is presented as an example of the type of program that could be brought into our homes more frequently through subscription TV. You don't need to be a statistician to figure out that if this program were viewed by so many millions it cost less than 1 cent per viewer. This is a very low price to pay to reach so many people with direct advertising.

Assuming that on subscription such a program would cost less than the price of a good movie—which varies geographically—you don't have to be a mathematician to figure out the astronomical box office for the slot machines on each set. With such a jackpot, how can the purveyors of pay TV resist moving on to more territory?

It should also be forcefully brought to the attention of the public that there will not be just one company sponsoring subscription TV. Each subscriber will have to buy a gadget or a meter for his set. Present estimates of the cost of such equipment run from $10 to $50. Let's say Mr. John Q. Public buys a meter. He may then run into the unexpected problem of wanting to view a program which is not carried by his particular service. Competition in the United States being what it is, is he going to have to acquire 3, 4, or more gadgets or slot machines or billing machines?

It is rumored that the gadget may be installed free by some companies. With the present estimate of $10 to $50 for the cost thereof, how can any company afford this tremendous outlay? Based on a recent Federal Communications Commission survey, there are an estimated 36 million sets in the United States.

Other rumor has it that if the gadget is free, installation costs will be charged, and same could amount to $30 a set. Under this arrangement, the subscriber could very well pay for both gadget and installation without realizing it. Totaling this up, the figure is staggering, on the basis of 36 million sets.

It is further advocated that fee TV cannot affect free TV. How can 1 station carry 2 programs simultaneously? In the words of the currently popular song, Something's Gotta Give, my guess is that it will be free TV.

As a Federal legislator, expected to consider carefully the overall results of any innovation such as this, I am dismayed at the probable effects of fee TV on our tax structure, employment, those in low-income brackets, transportation, and other industries. Will our movie houses, theaters, sports arenas, etc., be thrown into the discard? What happens to the tremendous investments in such real estate?

Television has been doing a satisfactory job to date and under present conditions. A great variety of entertainment and programs

FRANK THOMPSON, JR.

Frank Thompson, Jr., elected to Congress on November 2, 1954, to represent the Fourth Congressional District of New Jersey, is a life-long resident of that State's Capital city, Trenton.

"Thompy", as practically everyone calls him, has done much to enliven politics in his part of the Garden State. For example, in the recent campaign, instead of relying exclusively on speeches and personal appearances, he brought back to life an old-time political custom — the torchlight parade.

Even a band was included in the parade — but not just any old band. This band was the Capital City Five, a "Dixieland" jazz band with the real "low-down"feeling. As a result of these tactics, politics really "came to life" in the Fourth District.

This "Dixie" touch illustrates only one aspect of Mr. Thompson's interests in American culture. He has introduced several bills in the new Congress designed to enhance the cultural and artistic prestige of the United States, which he feels are as important in the world struggle with the Soviet Union as any of the "guns and butter" programs. Of particular interest to Washingtonians in this connection is his bill to establish in this city a war memorial hall, which would serve as a fine arts and mass communications center and which would also provide a suitable setting for important government functions.

A freshman in Congress, Mr. Thompson nevertheless has had considerable political and legislative experience on the state level to help him in his new job. He has served for five years in the New Jersey State Assembly and during that time, was very active in helping to form Democratic Party policies, including service as minority leader in the Assembly.

The new Congressman's military service has been both long and varied. He entered the United States Navy in 1941 and was not returned to reserve status until 1948. During that period, he commanded the USS LCI (L) 428 and LCI(Rocket) Squadrons 63 and 48. He received three combat decorations for action at Iwo Jima and Okinawa. While in the reserves, he commanded USNR Battalion 4-22 and returned to active duty for a 17 month tour on the staff of the Commander, Eastern Sea Frontier. Presently, he holds the rank of Commander in the Reserves.

The new Congressman attended Trenton parochial and public schools, Wake Forrest College in North Carolina, and received his law degree from the latter institution, opening his law practice in Trenton in 1948. He has law offices presently at 122 West State Street, Trenton.

"Thompy" is very much a family man, having married Evelina Van Metre of Washington, D. C., in 1942, and he now has two very attractive children, Anne Gleaves, 9, and Evelina Porter, 3.

When family and political affairs have permitted, the Congressman has shown great interest in civic matters, especially veterans' affairs, and has been active in the American Red Cross, the Chamber of Commerce, the National Foundation for Infantile Paralysis, the American Legion, the Veterans of Foreign Wars and the American Veterans Committee.

84TH CONGRESS
1ST SESSION

S. 2613

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

JULY 22, 1955

Mr. MURRAY introduced the following bill; which was read twice and referred to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare

A BILL

To establish a program of cultural interchange with foreign countries to meet the challenge of competitive coexistence with communism, to establish a Federal advisory commission to advise the Federal Government on ways to encourage artistic and cultural endeavor and appreciation, to provide awards of merit, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "American National Arts, Sports, and Recreation Act".

STATEMENT OF FINDINGS

SEC. 2. (a) The Congress hereby finds that the program of building armed strength should be widened into a

1 more flexible and imaginative strategy for competitive co-
2 existence with the Communists in every field and on every 3 front. The Congress further finds that (1) the Communists
4 have taken sports and culture and the impressionable years
5 of youth and transformed them into arenas of the cold war;
6 (2) the Russian athletes are not really amateurs, but are 7 professionals trained under government guidance with gov-
8 ernment help, bonuses, and money prizes; (3) ballet, the 9 theater, and literature are all shaped toward aiding com-
10 munism's long-range scheme of world domination, and from 11 Moscow there radiate troupes of athletes and artists, circulat-
12 ing through the Soviet world, the satellites, Red China,
13 India, and the West with their gospel of communism; (4)
14 America is proud not only of its material achievements but 15 also of its athletes and artists and its cultural achievements;
16 (5) the whole global scene should be surveyed and plans de-
17 veloped for getting the peoples of the world on our side
18 through maximum use of sports, the theater, and educational 19 exchanges, and indeed no field should be neglected; and 20 (6) it is through cultural interchange and development, more
21 than superhighways, science, and statistics, that the real 22 answer to communism must be sought.
23 (b) The Congress, approving and endorsing the state-

1 ments recently made by the President in support of the 2 cultural arts, further finds that (1) in the advancement of
3 the various activities which will make our civilization en-
4 dure and flourish, the Federal Government should do more
5 to give official recognition to the importance of the arts
6 and other cultural activities; (2) there is an important prin-
7 ciple which we should ever keep in mind—the principle that
8 freedom of the arts is a basic freedom, one of the pillars of 9 liberty in our land; (3) there is no aspiration, no dream
10 on the horizons of man's hopes and beliefs and faith, that
11 is so strong and so vivid as the dream of lasting peace; there
12 are many things that must be understood and many things
13 that must be done if we are to make progress toward the 14 realization of that dream, but there is one thing that edu-
15 cators cannot afford to forget, and that is this element of 16 understanding as opposed to mere knowledge; (4) we must 17 make the effort to understand something of the culture of 18 other peoples; their history, their tribulations, and the trials
19 through which they may have passed, for unless we under-
20 stand these things we will never comprehend why our 21 motives are so often misunderstood; and (5) peace is not 22 primarily in the hands of elected political leaders; it is in 23 the hands of the family and the home, the church and the 24 school.

24 mercial channels developed for the purposes of this title.

1 TITLE II—GRANTS TO STATES FOR THE DE-
2 VELOPMENT OF CULTURAL PROGRAMS AND 3 PROJECTS

4 DECLARATION OF PURPOSE

5 SEC. 201. The purpose of this title is—

6 (1) to assist the several States to inventory their 7 existing programs in the arts of music, dance, theater,
8 literature, architecture, painting, sculpture, the hand
9 arts and crafts, and the other cultural arts, to survey the 10 need for additional programs in these arts, and to de-11 velop programs and projects for public and other non-12 profit activities in the cultural arts in such a manner as 13 will, in conjunction with existing programs and facilities, 14 furnish adequate programs, facilities, and services in the 15 cultural arts to all their people;

16 (2) to assist in the construction of public and other
17 nonprofit centers for music, dance, theater, literature,
18 architecture, painting, sculpture, the hand arts and crafts,
19 and the other cultural arts in accordance with such pro-
20 grams, and particularly to assist in the construction and 21 maintenance of such centers in communities where urban 22 renewal or redevelopment projects have been undertaken
23 by local public agencies as provided in title I of the 24 Housing Act of 1949, as amended;

1 (3) to assist the several States to protect and pre-
2 serve our artistic and historic inheritance through the 3 protection and restoration of historic monuments, houses,
4 buildings, and sections of our cities;
5 (4) to assist the several States in developing proj-
6 ects and programs designed to supply leadership, train-
7 ing, and experience in the field of cultural arts; and 8 (5) to authorize the Secretary to conduct and 9 make grants for the conduct of research, experiments,
10 and demonstrations relating to the effective development
11 and utilization of facilities and resources in the fields
12 of the cultural arts, and to encourage the presentation in 13 all parts of the country of productions and programs in 14 every field of the arts.

15 AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATIONS

16 SEC. 202. In order to assist the States in carrying out
17 the purposes of this title, there is hereby authorized to be 18 appropriated for the fiscal year 1956 and each subsequent 19 fiscal year an amount equal to twice the revenue accruing
20 from the tax imposed by section 4231 (3) of the Internal 21 Revenue Code of 1954 during such fiscal year. The appro-22 priation made pursuant to this section for any fiscal year shall 23 continue to be available for allotment to the States during the 24 succeeding fiscal year.

STATE PLANS

SEC. 203. (a) Any State which desires to take advantage of the benefits of this title may submit a State plan for carrying out the purpose of this title. Such State plan must—

(1) designate the State department of education or a similar State agency selected by the Governor (hereinafter in this title referred to as the "State agency") as the sole agency for the administration, supervision, and control of the State plan;

(2) contain satisfactory evidence that the State agency will have authority to carry out such plan in accordance with this title;

(3) provide that the State treasurer (or, if there is no State treasurer, the officer exercising similar functions for the State) be appointed as custodian of funds received under this title from the Federal Government and receive and provide for the proper custody of such funds;

(4) set forth the program, policies, and methods to be followed in carrying out the State plan and in its administration and supervision;

(5) contain adequate assurances that high stand-

1 ards will be maintained for the cultural arts programs
2 and projects assisted under this title;
3 (6) provide for such methods of administration
4 as the Secretary deems necessary for the proper and
5 efficient administration of the plan;
6 (7) provide that the State agency will make such
7 reports, in such form and containing such information,
8 as the Secretary may from time to time require, and 9 comply with such provisions as the Secretary may find 10 necessary to assure the correctness and verification of 11 such reports;
12 (8) provide such rules, regulations, and standards
13 with respect to expenditures of funds made available
14 under this title as the Secretary may find reasonable
15 and necessary; and
16 (9) provide that the State agency will from time to 17 time review its cultural arts programs and projects and 18 submit to the Secretary any modifications thereof which
19 it considers appropriate.
20 (b) The Secretary shall approve any State plan and 21 any modification thereof which he believes to be feasible and 22 which complies with subsection (a).
23 (c) No changes in a State plan shall be required within 24 two years after the initial approval thereof, or within two
25 years after any change thereafter required therein, by reason

1 of any change in regulations prescribed by the Secretary,
2 except with the consent of the State or in accordance with
3 further action by the Congress.

4 (d) The State plan may include standards for deter-
5 mination of the Federal share of the cost of the cultural arts
6 programs and projects approved in the State. Such stand-
7 ards shall provide equitably (and, to the extent practicable,
8 on the basis of objective criteria) for variations between 9 programs and classes of programs, and between projects and 10 classes of projects, on the basis of the economic and cultural 11 status of areas, the relative need for additional programs and 12 projects as between areas, and other relevant factors. No
13 such standards shall provide for a Federal share of more than 14 50 per centum of the cost of any such program or project.
15 The Secretary shall approve any such standards and any 16 modifications thereof which comply with the purpose of this
17 title.

18 CONSTRUCTION PROJECTS

19 SEC. 204. For each project undertaken pursuant to a
20 State plan to carry out the purpose of section 201 (2),
21 there shall be submitted to the Secretary a special application
22 by the State agency or by the political subdivision, institu-
23 tion, or organization undertaking the project. Such appli-
24 cation shall set forth such information (including a descrip-
25 tion of the project and its plans and specifications in detail)

1 and assurances as the Secretary may require. The Secretary
2 shall approve such application if he determines that the
3 project is feasible, desirable, and consistent with this Act.
4 No such application shall be disapproved until the Secretary
5 has afforded the State agency an opportunity for a hearing.

6 ALLOTMENTS TO STATES

7 SEC. 205. (a) Each State for which a State plan has
8 been approved prior to or during a fiscal year shall be en-
9 titled for such year to an allotment of not to exceed $100,000
10 (as determined by the Secretary within the limits of avail-11 able appropriations) to assist in defraying the cost of 12 approved programs and projects in the cultural arts within 13 such State for that fiscal year. Such allotment shall be 14 available, in accordance with this title, for payment of the 15 Federal share of such cost.

16 (b) The Secretary shall calculate the allotments to be 17 made under subsection (a) and certify to the Secretary of 18 the Treasury the amounts thereof. Upon receipt of such 19 certification, the Secretary of the Treasury shall, prior to 20 audit or settlement by the General Accounting Office, pay in 21 accordance with such certification. Sums allotted to a State
22 for a fiscal year under this section and remaining unobligated
23 at the end of such year shall be made available to such State
24 for the same purposes for the next fiscal year (and for such 25 year only, except in the case of sums allotted to carry out

1 the purpose of section 201 (2)) in addition to the sums
2 allotted to such State for such next fiscal year. Any amount
3 of the sum appropriated pursuant to the authorization con-
4 tained in section 202 for a fiscal year which is not allotted
5 in such year by reason of the failure of any State or States
6 to have a plan approved under this title, and any amount
7 allotted to a State but remaining unobligated at the end
8 of the period for which it is available to such State under 9 the preceding sentence, is hereby authorized to be appro-
10 priated for the next fiscal year in addition to the sum other-
11 wise authorized for such next fiscal year under section 202.
12 (c) For the purposes of this section, the term "Federal 13 share" with respect to any program or project means the 14 proportion of the cost of such program or project to be paid
15 by the Federal Government, and shall be determined as 16 follows:
17 (1) If the State plan in effect at the time of such 18 program or project contains standards approved by the 19 Secretary as provided in section 203 (d), the Federal 20 share with respect to such program or project shall be 21 determined by the State agency in accordance with such 22 standards;
23 (2) If the State plan does not contain such stand-
24 ards, the Federal share shall be the amount, not more
25 than 50 per centum of the cost of the program or proj-

1 ect involved as established by the State agency, deter-
2 mined by the Secretary at the time he approves the
3 State plan.

4 WITHHOLDING OF CERTIFICATION

5 SEC. 206. Whenever the Secretary, after reasonable
6 notice and opportunity for hearing to the State agency,
7 finds—

8 (1) that such agency is not complying substantially
9 with the provisions of this title or the terms and con-
10 ditions of its State plan approved under this title;

11 (2) that any funds paid to such agency under this 12 title have been diverted from the purposes for which 13 they were allotted or paid;

14 (3) that any assurance given in the State plan is 15 not being or cannot be carried out; or

16 (4) that adequate State funds are not being pro-
17 vided annually for the direct administration of the State
18 plan,

19 the Secretary may forthwith notify the Secretary of the 20 Treasury and the State agency that no further certification
21 will be made under this title with respect to such State
22 agency until there is no longer any default or failure to
23 comply or the diversion has been corrected, or, if compliance

1 or correction is impossible, until the State repays or arranges
2 the repayment of the Federal funds which have been im-
3 properly diverted or expended.

4 DEFINITIONS

5 SEC. 207. For the purposes of this title—
6 (1) The term "Secretary" means the Secretary of
7 Health, Education, and Welfare; and
8 (2) The term "State" means a State, the District of 9 Columbia, Alaska, Hawaii, Puerto Rico, or the Virgin
10 Islands.

11 ADMINISTRATION OF TITLE II

12 SEC. 208. (a) The Secretary is authorized to make
13 such administrative regulations and perform such other func-
14 tions as he finds necessary to carry out the provisions of 15 this title.
16 (b) In administering this title, the Secretary is au-
17 thorized to utilize the services and facilities of any executive
18 department or agency in accordance with an agreement
19 with the head thereof. Payment for such services and 20 facilities shall be made in advance or by way of reimburse-
21 ment, as may be agreed upon between the Secretary and 22 the head of the executive department or agency furnishing 23 them.

TITLE III—ESTABLISHMENT OF A FEDERAL ADVISORY COMMISSION ON THE ARTS

STATEMENT OF FINDINGS AND POLICY

SEC. 301. (a) The Congress hereby finds that—

(1) in the advancement of the various activities which will make our civilization endure and flourish, the Federal Government should do more to give official recognition to the importance of the arts and other cultural activities;

(2) encouragement of the arts is a demonstration to itself and to others of a nation's belief in its spiritual resources and creative destiny. Throughout the great epochs of history, civilization has been importantly exemplified by masterworks of art and architecture, music, and the dance, drama, and literature. Achievements in these fields represent, of course, one of the enduring criteria by which history appraises any nation; and

(3) the United States, despite its relative youth, is rich in artistic achievement. We have contributed new power of design in architecture, created new rhythms in music, and developed a literature which commands worldwide attention. In the theater and film, and in the ancient form of the dance, we show a creative vitality. Our great museums, art galleries, and orchestras are a source of pride for our people. Yet there are many

1 respects in which we lag behind other nations in the
2 general position we accord to the arts in our society.
3 For example, new ways should be sought to bring the 4 enjoyment of and participation in the arts to more of
5 our people. We should also find ways to develop indi-
6 vidual talents in the arts. There are in our Nation many 7 persons of talent and genius, whose gifts need the 8 encouragement and recognition which persons in other
9 comparable fields enjoy. Private organizations and in-
10 dividuals and public organizations, at both community
11 and State levels, have provided strong support for the 12 arts—and that is as it should be. On the other hand, our

4 Government.

A BILL

To establish a program of cultural interchange with foreign countries to meet the challenge of competitive coexistence with communism, to establish a Federal advisory commission to advise the Federal Government on ways to encourage artistic and cultural endeavor and appreciation, to provide awards of merit, and for other purposes.

By Mr. MURRAY

From the Washington Office of Congressman Thompson

84TH CONGRESS
1ST SESSION

H. R. 6874

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

JUNE 16, 1955

Mr. THOMPSON of New Jersey introduced the following bill; which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor

A BILL

To establish a program of cultural interchange with foreign countries to meet the challenge of competitive coexistence with communism, to establish a Federal advisory commission to advise the Federal Government on ways to encourage artistic and cultural endeavor and appreciation, to provide awards of merit, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "American National Arts, Sports, and Recreation Act".

STATEMENT OF FINDINGS

SEC. 2. (a) The Congress hereby finds that the program of building armed strength should be widened into a more flexible and imaginative strategy for competitive co-existence with the Communists in every field and on every front. The Congress further finds that (1) the Communists have taken sports and culture and the impressionable years of youth and transformed them into arenas of the cold war; (2) the Russian athletes are not really amateurs, but are professionals trained under government guidance with government help, bonuses, and money prizes; (3) ballet, the theater, and literature are all shaped toward aiding communism's long-range scheme of world domination, and from Moscow there radiate troupes of athletes and artists, circulating through the Soviet world, the satellites, Red China, India, and the West with their gospel of communism; (4) America is proud not only of its material achievements but also of its athletes and artists and its cultural achievements; (5) the whole global scene should be surveyed and plans developed for getting the peoples of the world on our side through maximum use of sports, the theater, and educational exchanges, and indeed no field should be neglected; and (6) it is through cultural interchange and development, more than superhighways, science, and statistics, that the real answer to communism must be sought.

(b) The Congress, approving and endorsing the state-

1 ments recently made by the President in support of the
2 cultural arts, further finds that (1) in the advancement of
3 the various activities which will make our civilization en-
4 dure and flourish, the Federal Government should do more
5 to give official recognition to the importance of the arts
6 and other cultural activities; (2) there is an important prin-
7 ciple which we should ever keep in mind—the principle that
8 freedom of the arts is a basic freedom, one of the pillars of 9 liberty in our land; (3) there is no aspiration, no dream
10 on the horizons of man's hopes and beliefs and faith, that
11 is so strong and so vivid as the dream of lasting peace; there
12 are many things that must be understood and many things
13 that must be done if we are to make progress toward the 14 realization of that dream, but there is one thing that edu-
15 cators cannot afford to forget, and that is this element of 16 understanding as opposed to mere knowledge; (4) we must 17 make the effort to understand something of the culture of 18 other peoples; their history, their tribulations, and the trials
19 through which they may have passed, for unless we under-
20 stand these things we will never comprehend why our 21 motives are so often misunderstood; and (5) peace is not 22 primarily in the hands of elected political leaders; it is in 23 the hands of the family and the home, the church and the 24 school.

(4) set forth the program, policies, and methods to be followed in carrying out the State plan and in its administration and supervision;

(5) contain adequate assurances that high stand-

1 ards will be maintained for the cultural arts programs
2 and projects assisted under this title;
3 (6) provide for such methods of administration
4 as the Secretary deems necessary for the proper and
5 efficient administration of the plan;
6 (7) provide that the State agency will make such
7 reports, in such form and containing such information,
8 as the Secretary may from time to time require, and
9 comply with such provisions as the Secretary may find 10 necessary to assure the correctness and verification of 11 such reports;
12 (8) provide such rules, regulations, and standards
13 with respect to expenditures of funds made available
14 under this title as the Secretary may find reasonable
15 and necessary; and
16 (9) provide that the State agency will from time to 17 time review its cultural arts programs and projects and 18 submit to the Secretary any modifications thereof which
19 it considers appropriate.
20 (b) The Secretary shall approve any State plan and 21 any modification thereof which he believes to be feasible and 22 which complies with subsection (a).
23 (c) No changes in a State plan shall be required within 24 two years after the initial approval thereof, or within two
25 years after any change thereafter required therein, by reason

1 of any change in regulations prescribed by the Secretary,
2 except with the consent of the State or in accordance with
3 further action by the Congress.

4 (d) The State plan may include standards for deter-
5 mination of the Federal share of the cost of the cultural arts
6 programs and projects approved in the State. Such stand-
7 ards shall provide equitably (and, to the extent practicable,
8 on the basis of objective criteria) for variations between 9 programs and classes of programs, and between projects and 10 classes of projects, on the basis of the economic and cultural 11 status of areas, the relative need for additional programs and 12 projects as between areas, and other relevant factors. No
13 such standards shall provide for a Federal share of more than 14 50 per centum of the cost of any such program or project.
15 The Secretary shall approve any such standards and any 16 modifications thereof which comply with the purpose of this
17 title.

18 CONSTRUCTION PROJECTS

19 SEC. 204. For each project undertaken pursuant to a
20 State plan to carry out the purpose of section 201 (2),
21 there shall be submitted to the Secretary a special application
22 by the State agency or by the political subdivision, institu-
23 tion, or organization undertaking the project. Such appli-
24 cation shall set forth such information (including a descrip-
25 tion of the project and its plans and specifications in detail)

1 and assurances as the Secretary may require. The Secretary
2 shall approve such application if he determines that the
3 project is feasible, desirable, and consistent with this Act.
4 No such application shall be disapproved until the Secretary
5 has afforded the State agency an opportunity for a hearing.

6 ALLOTMENTS TO STATES

7 SEC. 205. (a) Each State for which a State plan has
8 been approved prior to or during a fiscal year shall be en-
9 titled for such year to an allotment of not to exceed $100,000
10 (as determined by the Secretary within the limits of avail-
11 able appropriations) to assist in defraying the cost of 12 approved programs and projects in the cultural arts within 13 such State for that fiscal year. Such allotment shall be 14 available, in accordance with this title, for payment of the 15 Federal share of such cost.

16 (b) The Secretary shall calculate the allotments to be 17 made under subsection (a) and certify to the Secretary of 18 the Treasury the amounts thereof. Upon receipt of such 19 certification, the Secretary of the Treasury shall, prior to 20 audit or settlement by the General Accounting Office, pay in 21 accordance with such certification. Sums allotted to a State
22 for a fiscal year under this section and remaining unobligated
23 at the end of such year shall be made available to such State
24 for the same purposes for the next fiscal year (and for such 25 year only, except in the case of sums allotted to carry out

1 the purpose of section 201 (2)) in addition to the sums
2 allotted to such State for such next fiscal year. Any amount
3 of the sum appropriated pursuant to the authorization con-
4 tained in section 202 for a fiscal year which is not allotted
5 in such year by reason of the failure of any State or States
6 to have a plan approved under this title, and any amount
7 allotted to a State but remaining unobligated at the end
8 of the period for which it is available to such State under 9 the preceding sentence, is hereby authorized to be appro-
10 priated for the next fiscal year in addition to the sum other-
11 wise authorized for such next fiscal year under section 202.
12 (c) For the purposes of this section, the term "Federal 13 share" with respect to any program or project means the 14 proportion of the cost of such program or project to be paid
15 by the Federal Government, and shall be determined as 16 follows:
17 (1) If the State plan in effect at the time of such 18 program or project contains standards approved by the 19 Secretary as provided in section 203 (d), the Federal 20 share with respect to such program or project shall be 21 determined by the State agency in accordance with such
22 standards;
23 (2) If the State plan does not contain such stand-
24 ards, the Federal share shall be the amount, not more
25 than 50 per centum of the cost of the program or proj-

1 ect involved as established by the State agency, deter-
2 mined by the Secretary at the time he approves the
3 State plan.

4 WITHHOLDING OF CERTIFICATION

5 SEC. 206. Whenever the Secretary, after reasonable
6 notice and opportunity for hearing to the State agency,
7 finds—

8 (1) that such agency is not complying substantially
9 with the provisions of this title or the terms and con-
10 ditions of its State plan approved under this title;

11 (2) that any funds paid to such agency under this 12 title have been diverted from the purposes for which 13 they were allotted or paid;

14 (3) that any assurance given in the State plan is 15 not being or cannot be carried out; or

16 (4) that adequate State funds are not being pro-
17 vided annually for the direct administration of the State
18 plan,

19 the Secretary may forthwith notify the Secretary of the 20 Treasury and the State agency that no further certification
21 will be made under this title with respect to such State
22 agency until there is no longer any default or failure to
23 comply or the diversion has been corrected, or, if compliance

1 or correction is impossible, until the State repays or arranges
2 the repayment of the Federal funds which have been im-
3 properly diverted or expended.

4 DEFINITIONS

5 SEC. 207. For the purposes of this title—
6 (1) The term "Secretary" means the Secretary of
7 Health, Education, and Welfare; and
8 (2) The term "State" means a State, the District of 9 Columbia, Alaska, Hawaii, Puerto Rico, or the Virgin
10 Islands.

11 ADMINISTRATION OF TITLE II

12 SEC. 208. (a) The Secretary is authorized to make
13 such administrative regulations and perform such other func-
14 tions as he finds necessary to carry out the provisions of 15 this title.
16 (b) In administering this title, the Secretary is au-
17 thorized to utilize the services and facilities of any executive
18 department or agency in accordance with an agreement
19 with the head thereof. Payment for such services and 20 facilities shall be made in advance or by way of reimburse-
21 ment, as may be agreed upon between the Secretary and 22 the head of the executive department or agency furnishing 23 them.

1 TITLE III—ESTABLISHMENT OF A FEDERAL AD-
2 VISORY COMMISSION ON THE ARTS

3 STATEMENT OF FINDINGS AND POLICY

4 SEC. 301. (a) The Congress hereby finds that—

5 (1) in the advancement of the various activities
6 which will make our civilization endure and flourish,
7 the Federal Government should do more to give official
8 recognition to the importance of the arts and other
9 cultural activities;

10 (2) encouragement of the arts is a demonstration
11 to itself and to others of a nation's belief in its spiritual 12 resources and creative destiny. Throughout the great 13 epochs of history, civilization has been importantly ex-
14 emplified by masterworks of art and architecture, music, 15 and the dance, drama, and literature. Achievements in 16 these fields represent, of course, one of the enduring 17 criteria by which history appraises any nation; and 18 (3) the United States, despite its relative youth, is 19 rich in artistic achievement. We have contributed new 20 power of design in architecture, created new rhythms

21 in music, and developed a literature which commands
22 worldwide attention. In the theater and film, and in 23 the ancient form of the dance, we show a creative vital-
24 ity. Our great museums, art galleries, and orchestras
25 are a source of pride for our people. Yet there are many

1 respects in which we lag behind other nations in the
2 general position we accord to the arts in our society.
3 For example, new ways should be sought to bring the
4 enjoyment of and participation in the arts to more of
5 our people. We should also find ways to develop indi-
6 vidual talents in the arts. There are in our Nation many 7 persons of talent and genius, whose gifts need the
8 encouragement and recognition which persons in other
9 comparable fields enjoy. Private organizations and in-
10 dividuals and public organizations, at both community
11 and State levels, have provided strong support for the 12 arts—and that is as it should be. On the other hand, our 13 National Government has not lent its encouragement and 14 prestige to the arts to the extent that is desirable.
15 (b) The Congress hereby declares it to be the policy
16 of the United States—
17 (a) that the growth and flourishing of the arts
18 depends upon freedom, imagination, and individual
19 initiative;
20 (b) that the encouragement of creative activity in 21 the performance and practice of the arts, and of a wide-
22 spread participation in and appreciation of the arts, is 23 essential to the general welfare and the national interest;
24 and

1 (c) that the encouragement of the arts, while pri-
2 marily a matter for private and local initiative, is an
3 appropriate matter of concern to the United States
4 Government.

5 ESTABLISHMENT OF THE COMMISSION

6 SEC. 302. (a) There is hereby established in the Depart-

8 SEC. 303. The Commission shall undertake studies of,
9 and make recommendations relating to, appropriate methods,
10 consistent with the policies set forth in section 301, for en-11 couragement of creative activity in the performance and 12 practice of the arts and of participation in and appreciation
13 of the arts. Such studies shall be conducted by special com-
14 mittees of persons, expert in the field of art involved, ap-
15 pointed by the Secretary after consultation with the Com-
16 mission. After considering reports on these studies, the 17 Commission shall make recommendations in writing to the 18 Secretary. In the selection of subjects to be studied and

Dear Ed Murrow:

I telephoned you a few weeks back immediately following your broadcast on the young Texas editor who won the Pulitzer Prize, and left a message which I hope you got. In case you didn't receive it, this is just a follow-up to repeat my sincere appreciation of a wonderful program.

My family and I continue to enjoy both "Person to Person" and "See It Now" each week. Your contributions to the television world are invaluable, and I'm proud to be in the same business with you.

Just a note to say that on the day you telegraphed me of your regret that you did not have a method to do a program on the project we discussed, I clipped the enclosed story from the New York Times. I had intended to send you a copy of it much earlier. The Newfoundland situation is a parallel to the Maine coast conditions.

NEWEST PROVINCE ASKS CANADA AID

Newfoundland Says Federal Help Is Needed to Abolish Poverty, Backwardness

By RAYMOND DANIELL
Special to The New York Times.

ST. JOHN'S, Nfld., Oct. 18—Canada's newest province told a royal commission today that it could contribute much to the country's prosperity if it had federal help in developing its natural resources.

Newfoundland, which became a member of the Canadian confederation of provinces as recently as 1949, was Britain's oldest colony. Economically the province is far behind even the poorest province on the mainland.

Premier Joseph Smallwood, a successful politician, told the commissioners who are charged with looking into Canada's economic prospects over the next twenty-five years that his people expected federal help in their development but would not live on the dole.

He said that rather than be treated as a poor relation living on charity he would favor secession from the confederation.

At the time Newfoundland joined Canada there was considerable agitation for union with the United States. There is still a body of opinion that believes the wrong choice was made. The $30,000,000 a year that is derived from the 12,000 members of the United States armed forces here is of great importance to the Newfoundland economy.

The New York Times Oct. 19, 1958
ASSISTANCE ASKED: The Province of Newfoundland (cross-hatching) wants help in economic development.

Commission's First Hearing

The royal commission, whose chairman is Walter Gordon, an industrial consultant of Toronto, was holding its first public hearing in this region. It recently completed a fact-finding tour of the Northwest Territories where the exploitation of vast mineral wealth awaits only the opening of transportation facilities.

Today's hearing was held in the provincial Hall of Assembly. The province's brief was presented by H. Carl Goldenberg, an Ontario lawyer retained by Mr. Smallwood's government. Mr. Goldenberg has also represented the prosperous British Columbia Government.

Mr. Smallwood, supplementing the brief, said Newfoundland was far behind the poorest and most backward of the Maritime Provinces in schools, hospitals, roads and other essential services.

Merely to match the present standard of living of the Maritime Provinces, the poorest in Canada, in the next twenty-five years would take $1,250,000,000, Mr. Smallwood said. At the same time, he said, Newfoundland's growth has to be taken into account. It is not enough to provide services for its present population. It is necessary, he said, to foresee an increase in the population of 300,000.

Population Growth Analyzed

Newfoundland now has a population of 400,000 and, according to its Premier, it has the highest birth rate and the lowest death rate in Canada. Since joining Canada, he said, its young people are not migrating in great numbers to the North American mainland because they see a glowing future for their island home.

Newfoundland, he repeated, is far behind the times. It need not remain so, he declared. All that is needed, he said, is a little help from Ottawa in developing the province's great fishery, forest and mineral wealth.

For generations Newfoundland has depended primarily on fishing for its livelihood. Recently the economy has become more diversified. The pulp and paper industry and mining have become important contributors to the prosperity of the island.

Mr. Smallwood told the commission that there was enough standing timber to provide for three more paper mills.

In that part of Labrador that is within Newfoundland's domain, he said, there are rich deposits of iron ore. Twelve million horsepower is ready for development there, he said. It would probably cost $1,000,000,000 to harness the streams, but he insisted it was worth it.

Dear Mr. Murrow:

J. Edward Todd has forwarded your recent letter seeking more information regarding the proposed research on the islands and coastal areas of the United States. Permit me to draw the picture in somewhat more detail, but before doing so, may I present the individuals in our group?

J. Edward Todd, Ph D., Columbia University; Dean of Admissions, Institute of Paper Chemistry (Graduate School), Appleton, Wisconsin; AAAS, APA, Amer. Stat. Assn.

George Loewenstein, M.D., Dark Harbor, Maine; FAPH, PHMedicinal Director (retired), Permanent Consultant of ECOSOC, U.N.

W. Henry Hatch, B.S. University of Maine; U.S. Air Corps; Landscaping; Contractor; Board of Selectmen, School Building Committee; Native of Islesboro.

Margaret T. Hatch, M.A.,University of Minnesota; Asst. Director, Women's Residence Halls, Purdue University, Lafayette, Indiana; Homemaker.

In studying the U.S. Geodetic Survey maps of the coastal areas of our nation, we find a great number of islands and coastal regions not located near any large mainland communities. Many of these islands and hinterlands are inhabited, but at what economic, sociological, cultural or spiritual levels?

Maine islands and coastal areas constitute one major example of the economic deterioration about which we are concerned. Problems of employment, education, transportation, communication and recreation are similar no matter where the islands and isolated regions are located and for this reason we propose that a study be made of the natural and human resources of the islands and coastal areas of the United States.

There are several million people, which in themselves are of economic importance to our nation, struggling for existence in these areas. From the standpoint of geological, agricultural and industrial contributions to the economy of the surrounding territory, as well as to the nation as a whole, these regions are important. Kindly consider the following points with us:

Coastal islands and areas have contributed tremendously to the development of our country in the past through the historical periods of ship-building, exporting and importing, summer resident trading, lobstering, fishing, wood pulp cutting and lumbering, cancer and behavioral research, some farming and poultry raising. Most of these means of livelihood are declinging or are unsteady. Does this mean that the usefulness of these areas is finished or nearly so?

These

There is also the fact that when prosperity and advancement exist on the mainland, the islands are faced with depression and degeneration for the energetic wage earners leave for areas of steady work and high wages.

Everyone hears that rural areas are feeding the cream of their young people to the large cities and industrial centers. There are also the alarming facts on the rise of divorce, juvenile delinquency and problems of personal relations which are aggravated by urban living conditions.

In many areas, decentralization, through small community planning, is taking place in an attempt to maintain and promote mentally, physically and spiritually healthy homes and thus conserve our greatest natural resource - people.

In this instance, our islands are similar to mainland rural areas in their loss of promising young people, but still unique in the fact that there are a few valuable characteristics which are perhaps more ingrained in island folk than in those of the mainland, such as individual thought and action, practical and utilitarian methods of approach to problems, poise, wholesomeness untainted by the sophistication of nearby cities.

Isn't it imperative that efforts to develop additional healthy and wholesome "breeding grounds" for our greatest natural resource be exerted?

We must recognize that in addition to lack of steady employment for young people, the problem of recreational opportunities is outstanding. In populated areas, the young people have a wide variety within driving distance - youth centers with paid directors and advisors, concert halls, theaters, museums, fairs, circuses, trips, outings and activities afforded by clubs or schools because there are more to share the expense. Island recreation is obviously limited.

We recommend, therefore, that a center be established to set up an intensive program of research on these areas, past, present and future. From the comprehensive data thus gathered, recommendations and courses of action would be presented to all communities and districts involved.

Because we realize that no accumulation of date and resulting recommendations are going to provide an immediate and complete panacea to the problem; and because of the magnitude and importance of this problem, we believe that the research center should be continued permanently.

We are writing you for we feel that with your personality, interest and broad knowledge, you could direct the eye of the public toward these deserving isolated populations which have and could continue to make definite contributions to our state and national welfare.

We hope that the above information increases your interest. Due to the impossibility of all our group meeting on October 5, Dr. Todd will talk over these ideas with you. We now believe that the group can meet in New York on October 20 or 21. We would like to call upon you, if you feel this matter is of sufficient interest to warrant your further study.

Dear Mr. Murrow:

On my return to Appleton, I have heard from Dr. Loewenstein. He will not be able to come to New York on October 6 as Miss Meyer, my secretary, had written you on August 30. He will, however, be able to be there during the afternoon of October 5. As he will be flying from Maine to New York, he will probably not reach there until 1:00 P. M. or later if there is any delay. So it seems that we should suggest that we come to your office at 3:00 P. M. on October 5; --or later that afternoon if you prefer.

We are grateful for the opportunity to discuss with you the status of the islands along the Maine coast.

Dear Mr. Murrow:

A few of us are deeply interested in an idea and believe you will see its significance because of your interest and broad knowledge in the general field in which our idea lies. We would like to discuss the idea with you if you could possibly give us the time.

Dr. George Loewenstein and my son-in-law and my daughter, Mr. and Mrs. Henry Hatch of Dark Harbor, Islesboro Island, Maine, and I are acutely aware of the economic deterioration of most of the islands along the Maine coast and along the other shores of the United States and the corresponding deterioration of the well-being of the several million people who inhabit these islands. The islands and the people who live on them are much too valuable resources in many ways for this nation to let go to waste. As important in many respects as the efforts and money we as a nation are spending on economic research and welfare and aid to many segments of our American population and foreign countries is the research which is so urgently needed in regard to the islands and coastal hinterlands of the United States. Dr. Loewenstein has suggested that a research program be undertaken to determine what may be done on the islands to develop the various natural and human resources and in doing so rehabilitate many of the people who are suffering in the present economic, sociological, and cultural decline.

We request the opportunity to talk this matter over with you. We can come to your office in New York. I am expecting to be in the East from August 20 until September 2 and again the last week in September and the first two weeks in October. Some day during the time that I will be in the East will be the most economical and convenient for me but some other day more suitable to you is possible. Please suggest a date.

Dear Ed,

That was certainly a fine talk you made at "21" the other Monday, quite apart from the fact that it was far too generous and that I enjoyed it very much. Somehow, in the old days, I never thought that I'd sit at a 25th anniversary lunch while you made a speech about me. But I am very glad that I did and even gladder that you did.

If I had the chance, I'd like to make a speech about your broadcasts these days from the Middle East. Nobody else that I have heard seems to be making sense about this latest U.S. Munich and its probable consequences. I quote you on the air whenever I can. Your words from the Mediterranean are quite different from those in the Hunt Room and both are enormously welcome.

All the best,

Dear Mr. Murrow;

We have just recorded a series of orchestral compositions which will be released under the title, "MUSICAL HEADLINES". This series has been written by the same composer and recorded by the same WORLD SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA that received unusual acclaim for the album, "MUSICAL NOTES FROM A TOURIST'S SKETCH BOOK". You will find enclosed, some of the press reviews and one of the hundreds of similar station reactions sent to us.

On the record cover of "MUSICAL HEADLINES", we are planning to reproduce pictures of outstanding personalities in the field of news coverage. The pictures will be printed under the heading, "REQUEST RECORDS SALUTES THE MEN WHO BRING THE NEWS INTO OUR HOMES".

Since the presentation will be dignified and involves no controversial issue, and since the pictures will, in no way, constitute an endorsement, our legal advisors have informed us that it would not be necessary to obtain permission to print them. However, we do not wish to include any picture in this honor roll without consent.

We would appreciate your letting us know if we may print your picture under the heading as outlined above. In case you have a favorite picture you would care to send us, we would be most happy to use it.

collosal | first rate | not bad | impossible musical notes from a tourist's sketch book (h. j. lengsfelder)

The World Symphony Orchestra, H. Andeau, conductor
Request LP-10027

Under the heading of "novelty" there are few, very few LP's today which can be said to stand the test of musical integrety. It is often difficult to persuade the "serious" music lover that there really is such a thing as good music of a lighter type, though not really what we have come to term "popular" in America. Mr. Lengsfelder, himself a world-traveler many times over, has written a group of light pieces drawing his inspiration from various countries throughout the world. His scoring is particularly interesting for its use of an organ with a full orchestra . . never solo . . only in ensemble passages. The effect is novel and very pleasant. The recording is well engineered and manages to get away from the Dave Rose "strings in the shower" sound, yet has a full vibrant quality. It is certainly refreshing to hear a group of musicians playing lighter music with enthusiasm in sharp contrast to the dozens of recordings being ground out of studios in which the only interest on the part of the musicians is obviously their remuneration in the form of a pay check. The World Symphony is quite obviously a group of European musicians who have a real feeling for the music and play it with a zest which I suspect is more than an imitation of the French "feel" for charming effect. The Typewriter Concerto has a very amusing typewriter-like sound throughout which is not unlike some of the musical gymnastics usually associated with Leroy Anderson. The best tune on the LP is Caramba La Samba. It has some passages "blown" by the brass that are really quite exciting. For honest . . not over-mellow string sound, An American in Venice makes a good deal of musical sense. (dh)

MUSICAL NOTES FROM A TOURIST'S SKETCH BOOK World Symphony Orchestra (1-12")
Request 10027

Here is a delightful collection of light, happy tunes, each portraying a musical impression of either a city or an event. They were all penned by Hans J. Lengsfelder who has written many songs in this vein. They are played brightly by the World Symphony Orchestra directed by H. Andeau. Brightest sides are "Typewriter Concerto" (which was written prior to the one by Leroy Anderson), "The Ball of the Crickets," "Tyrolina Tango," "Harem Harmonies," and "The Sleepy Carousel." Sides will make good programing material for pop and classical deejays. The cover is attractive.

Dear Mr. Lengsfelder:

Was quite pleased to hear from you again -- and please be assured that "MUSICAL NOTES" has become a permanent part of my programming. I have used at least one selection from the disc on every one of my morning programs since I received it -- which should give you some indication of my personal reaction to it.

With regard to the listeners' reaction, I think their favorite has become the "TYROLIAN TANGO" -- and next "BALL OF THE CRICKETS". I am, of course, basing this upon the letters and telephone calls I get inquiring as to where the records can be purchased. Of course, I like them all -- but then I might add I've been an admirer of yours since first hearing "THE TYPEWRITER CONCERTO". Just in case you're interested, you were included on my "BEST IN MUSIC" program this week along with Meyerbeer, Mozart, Paganini, Mendelssohn, and Gounod.

I shall be most interested in hearing of your new releases with the World Symphony Orchestra -- and trust, in the interests of good music, that this will be in the very near future.

Dear Mr. Murrow:

We are gathering material for the first issue of a new inspirational type pocket-size magazine to be distributed free to our 20,000 dealers (95% women) from coast to coast and we would like very much to have an article by you in an early issue.

This little monthly publication will be purely non-commercial and non-profit with no advertising or sales promotional material. In it we are not trying to give sales training or recruit more dealers or anything of that nature. We have other publications for those purposes. In this one, we are not necessarily trying to make our people better dealers, but better people.

For this purpose, we plan that the magazine will have at first only about three articles; One by our vice-president and general manager, Brownie Wise; one by an obscure person who has overcome an obstacle in life; and third, an article by some person in the public eye, such as yourself.

Your article can be something you have previously published in a magazine or newspaper, an excerpt from a book; or a talk. Or it can be unpublished material. The subject is optional as long as it is inspirational, teaching some lesson of character-building; philosophy or general help for everyday living.

The enclosed reprints will give you a little background on our company if that is of interest to you.

We shall be anxious to hear from you.

TURKEY REGRETS INCIDENTS WILL PAY COMPENSATION

Text of the official communique issued by the Turkish Government in connection with the recent disorders in Izmir and Istanbul:

' The outrage perpetrated at Salonica on the house of our beloved Atatürk and on the Turkish Consulate, occuring at a time when public opinion had already been in a state of aroused emotion for several months because of incidents connected with the 'Cyprus question', as well as the instigations by provocators composed partly of persons with threacherous designs and partly by irresponsible elements devoid of a sense of judgement, have resulted in demonstrations on the part of large masses. These continued, particularly in Istanbul, into the late hours of last night.

' We have to state with the deepest grief and regret that during these demonstrations great damage was caused by entering shops and stores of which a large majority belonged to our Greek-speaking citizens. It can be said that, last night, Istanbul and the country was subjected to an essentially Communistic conspiracy and instigation, and to a severe shock.

' This irresponsible action, designed against the best interests of the country, has caused the destruction of a part of our national wealth and resulted in heavy damage, difficult to repair, for a number of Turkish citizens whose every right stands guaranteed under the Constitution. It has become a major catastrophe.

' Without doubt, the speedy indemnification and compensation of the damages suffered by these citizens falls within the prerequisites of the State; this requirement will be fulfilled.

' All necessary measures have been taken, and will continue to be taken, to re-establish immediately the public order and tranquillity which was greatly disturbed by these incidents. As one most urgent measure during these occurences, a state of emergency was proclaimed in Istanbul and Izmir, and has been lifted following the assumption of control by government forces.

' Those who took part, either directly as perpetrators and their tools, or as planners and instigators, in this most regrettable incident in which planned as well as irresponsible provocation played a leading part, will be punished speedily and without fail. A large number of instigators have already been apprehended, and legal proceedings started against them.

' The greatest patriotic duty that befalls all our citizens, who are perceptive and conscientious and imbued with sincere attachment to the high interests of the country, is to aid the Government in its action. '

Dear Dean Turner:

I have just returned from vacation to find your letter of August 24th.

I regret to say that I have no files on the National Student Association. They all disappeared during the war.

The best I can do is suggest two possible sources: Namely Mr. Chester Williams, whose address is WORLD INFORMATION, Empire State Building New York 1, New York; and Martha Biehle, who is with the Preparatory Commission for the International Refugee Organization, 1344 Connecticut Avenue, Washington 25, D.C.

I trust they will be able to help you.

Dear Mr. Murrow,-

If my memory serves me correctly, you visited my office sometime in the early 1930's as a representative of the National Students Federation.

In a recent conversation with some of the officers of the present National Students Association, I ventured the opinion that the National Students Federation was probably the forerunner and perhaps the father or grandfather of the present National Students Association. I found that the NSA people seemed to have no knowledge at all of the Federation, which is understandable since many of them were small children, if they had actually arrived at that time.

Do you have any records in your files which might indicate any relationship between the Federation and the present day National Students Association.

Sincerely,

A short time ago we made up a needlepoint vest for Mrs. Lawson Turner of Forest, Virginia. I presume she has presented you with the waistcoat by this time.

In view of the fact that we used one of your weskits as a guide in making up the vest and having it completed without a fitting, we do not know whether it fits you properly.

Should it need any adjustment whatsoever, kindly drop in with it and we will see to it that the alteration is made for you.

It gave me pleasure to make it and I hope you get lots of fun wearing it.

NO-Ignore

Dear Ed,

I have just returned from the Moral Re-Armament Mission to Asia and Africa. It included 198 people from 28 nations; Members of Parliament, industrialists, former communists, and the ideological musical play "The Vanishing Island" which was shown to 80,000 in representative audiences in the 18 countries we visited. In 11 of these we were guests of the governments concerned.

This outline from the Congressional Record suggests the response. In the more relaxed post-Geneva atmosphere the ideological situation is naturally more important than ever. We found in strongly anti-communist countries like Formosa and Viet Nam and the neutralist countries like Burma as well as in the Moslem world the keenest interest in an ideology which changes men and fights for absolute standards.

We expect to be in New York and Washington for the coming weeks and will hope to see you.

All the best,

Yours sincerely,

Ken

PROCEEDINGS AND DEBATES OF THE 84th CONGRESS, FIRST SESSION

MORAL RE-ARMAMENT STATESMEN'S MISSION

SPEECH

OF

HON. HARRY R. SHEPPARD

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 1, 1955

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. Speaker, I want to call your attention at this point in the proceedings to the heartening and inspiring news of the MRA statesmen's mission. The program for this mission was prepared at the World Assembly for Moral Re-Armament under the leadership of Dr. Frank N. D. Buchman at Mackinac Island, Mich., May 26 to June 5. Following its reception in Washington, the mission left on June 10 for Honolulu and Japan.

BACKGROUND FACTS

A group of African and Asian leaders prepared a statement following the World Assembly for Moral Re-Armament at Washington in January 1955. In it they said:

> Moral re-armament points the way to achieve a constructive cooperation which none need fear and which can benefit all mankind.

At the Bandung Conference in April, Dr. Fadhil Jamali, leader of the Iraqi delegation, in a vigorously applauded speech at the first plenary session made an appeal for East-West unity on a basis of moral re-armament.

Mr. Speaker, national leaders who were hosts to or received the statesmen's mission were Ichiro Hatoyama, Prime Minister of Japan; the Foreign Minister and Acting Prime Minister of the Republic of Korea; President and Madame Chiang Kai-shek, and O. K. Yui, Prime Minister of the Republic of China; Ramon Magsaysay, President of the Republic of the Philippines; Ngo Dinh Diem, President and Prime Minister of Vietnam; Field Marshal Pibulsonggram, Prime Minister of Thailand; Dr. Ba U, President, and U Nu, Prime Minister of the Union of Burma; Sir John Kotelawala, Prime Minister of Ceylon; Dr. Rajendra Prasad, President of India; Mohammed Ali, Prime Minister of Pakistan; His Imperial Majesty the Shah of Iran and Prime Minister Hussein Ala; Burhanuddin Bashayan, Foreign Minister of Iraq; Col. Gamel Abdel Nasser, Prime Minister of Egypt; Members of the Council of Ministers of Kenya and the Mayor of Nairobi; and Adnan Menderes, Prime Minister, and Fuat Koprulu, Deputy Prime Minister of Turkey.

MISSION WHO'S WHO

The Mission itself is composed of political and other national leaders from all five continents and they take with them the cast of a new ideological play The Vanishing Island, written by Peter Howard. The party consists of 198 men and women from 28 nations.

Among those taking part, either throughout or at certain stages of the journey, are Dr. Theodor Oberlaender, Minister for Refugees in the German Federal Cabinet; Diomede Catroux, member of the French National Assembly, Minister of Air in the Mendes-France cabinet; Ole Bjorn Kraft, leader of the Danish Conservative Party and chairman of NATO 1952–53; Mohammed Masmoudi, Minister of State for Tunisia; The Tolon Na, Yakabu Tali, Member of the Gold Coast Legislature and president of the Northern Territories Council; Eugene Claudius-Petit, Cabinet Minister in 10 postwar French governments; the Honorable B. C. Okwu, member of the House of Assembly in Eastern Nigeria; Madam Irene Laure, former deputy in the French Parliament and secretary-general of the Socialist Women of France; Dr. Oskar Leimgruber, Chancellor of the Swiss Confederation, 1943–51; Majid Movaghar, representing the Shah of Iran; Air Vice Marshal Thomas Traill, former Director General of Personnel, Royal Air Force; John McGovern, member of Parliament, Great Britain; James Haworth, member of the national executive of the British Labor Party; Niro Hoshijima, member of the Japanese Diet and signatory of the Japanese Peace Treaty; The Honorable Charles B. Deane, Member of the United States House of Representatives; Joseph Scott, leading Catholic attorney of Los Angeles; Senator Shidzue Kato, Member of the Japanese House of Councillors; Kanju Kato, former Minister of Labor of Japan and leader of the rightwing Socialist Party; Ibrahim Shukrullah, Secretary of the Arab League Council, Cairo; Dr. Daniel Lew, United Nations technical counselor for Nationalist China; Kahi Harawira, New Zealand; Daw Nyein Tha, nationally known educator of Burma; Surya Sena, son of Sir James Pieris, first Ceylonese to preside over the Legislative Assembly of Ceylon; Ian MacLean, executive officer, Kenya Coffee Board; Prof. Barend Nel, dean of the faculty of education, University of Pretoria; Dr. William Nkomo, founder and first president of the African National Congress Youth League; Thio Chan Bee, noted educator of Malaya and for 7 years member of Legislative Council of Singapore; Fausto Pecorari, vice president of the Italian Constituent Assembly; Robert Carmichael, president of the jute industry of France and newly elected president of the European jute industry; Robin C. Mowat, senior lecturer in history, Royal Naval College, Greenwich; Ole Olsen of the Olsen and Johnson productions.

The national hosts to the MRA Statesmen's Mission, beginning in Japan, received the following message from the Speaker of the House of Representatives and the majority and minority leaders of the House. The message reads:

> To the Honorable Ichiro Hatoyama, Prime Minister of Japan:
> As Members of the United States Congress, we recognize the great significance of the moral re-armament mission of 170 from some 28 countries now traveling to and through the principal capitals of Asia, North Africa, and the Middle East with the musical play, The Vanishing Island, which dramatizes the central struggle of our time. The play was witnessed in Washington by overflow audiences including key administration, political, and military leaders.

The principles that moral re-armament represents, which are basic to all people who desire freedom, can be a decisive factor for the whole world when applied by men and women of all races, all creeds and in all walks of life. We heartily commend this mission to you and to your people.

SAM RAYBURN,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.
JOSEPH W. MARTIN, JR.,
Minority Leader, House of Representatives.
JOHN MCCORMACK,
Majority Leader, House of Representatives.

Enroute to Japan the mission stopped at Honolulu for a presentation of The Vanishing Island which had been arranged by a committee of invitation whose chairman, Walter Dillingham, senior businessman of Hawaii, stated:

A great gift has been made to the people of Honolulu. It is the only thing I have ever heard of that has any chance of revolutionizing the thinking of the world.

JAPAN

Mr. Hatoyama, the Prime Minister, said at the reception of this mission:

This has been the most memorable moment of my life.

Mr. Ogata, newly elected head of the Liberal Party, said:

This is something we have never seen before. The problem in the world is division. The only answer is unity. MRA is the agency that is going to bring it.

The evaluation of a member of the Diet was:

You have changed the fate of Japan. You have given us back the hope that had gone out of our lives.

The Prime Minister, members of his cabinet, and over 100 members of the Diet went to see The Vanishing Island. It was given to the nation on the television network. News of it was on the radio and in the newspapers every day and night. For the first time in history Japanese homes gave hospitality on such a scale to westerners. Said the Nippon Times in an editorial:

In Japan we have need for this ideology of MRA. Hatred, bitterness, jealousy, and greed have permeated deep into the hearts of too many of our people. We need to clean out the dregs which have poisoned our spirits and made us chase after false values and ideologies. The coming of the MRA task force is an opportunity for all of us to do some serious soul searching and above all let there be no hypocrites among us.

This newspaper then published a 4-page special edition on the work of MRA around the world.

Thirty of the principal national labor leaders of Japan, including 7 national chairmen, representing over 3 million workers from all 3 major divisions of organized labor, met with leaders of the Mission.

Prime Minister Hatoyama designated Niro Hoshijima, top policy adviser and one of the signatories of the Japanese Peace Treaty in San Francisco in 1951, to accompany the mission to Formosa and the Philippines. Also with him was Kanju Kato, the former Minister of Labor.

There was also Nakajima, who lost his family and was seriously burned when the atomic bomb was exploded over Hiroshima. This man was a trade-union leader who lost his bitterness toward America when he came to the Moral Re-Armament Assembly in Caux, Switzerland, 3 years ago. He will travel with the mission throughout Asia, giving his evidence of the ideology which is uniting the East and West.

REPUBLIC OF CHINA

"Chiang Salutes MRA as Invincible Force," headlined the New York Journal-American in reporting the response to the moral re-armament statesmen's mission in Formosa. President and Madame Chiang Kai-shek received the Mission in Taipei. He said:

Moral Re-Armament is providing the world with ideological leadership.

It is the most important form of aid we have ever received. Your Mission has created a great impression not only throughout this nation but also on the Communist mainland.

He told Reginald Owen, who plays in The Vanishing Island, that the theater was the most powerful ideological weapon today, that the Communists had effectively used it, and that he rejoiced that the free world was now doing the job effectively in the moral re-armament plays.

Gen. Ho Ying-chin, who received the surrender of the Japanese armies in 1945, evaluated the work of the mission:

You are forging the moral and ideological basis of East-West unity. This visit is unprecedented in the history of China. Never before has such a group come to China or for that matter to any Asian nation.

The streets of Taipei were crisscrossed with scarlet banners emblazoned in gold with the words, "MRA, an idea to win the world."

Dr. Daniel Lew, technical counsellor for Nationalist China at the United Nations, was designated to travel with the mission. He said:

I expected to find some brand of anticommunism. Instead I found an idea to win humanity.

Eight broadcasts to southeast Asia and Communist China were made from Formosa, Japan, and Manila. Peter Howard said in one of these broadcasts:

Attempts, however sincere, to make a new world must inevitably fail unless a new type of man is created to live in it. New systems crumble before the same old motives of greed, mistrust, and exploitation. Those who use hate to gain control inevitably find that they have to use force to keep it. You cannot make a new world out of the same old people. You cannot make a good omelet out of bad eggs. A new type of world demands a new type of man. The ideology which produces the new type of man will win the world. And basic change in a man's motives can take place. I know it because it happened to me.

REPUBLIC OF KOREA

The Government of the Republic of Korea arranged for a delegation from the mission to visit Seoul. The delegation was received by members of the cabinet, chiefs of armed forces, and leaders of education and social welfare.

A favorable turn to the vexed problem of Korean-Japanese relations was given by a message of apology from leading members of the Japanese Parliament conveyed on their behalf by former NATO Chairman Ole Bjorn Kraft to the Foreign Minister and other members of the Korean Cabinet.

The Foreign Minister, who was also Acting Prime Minister under President Syngman Rhee, said:

I am convinced that unless the world catches this spirit of moral re-armament, another world disaster will be inevitable.

Members of the mission were honor guests at the ceremonies on June 25 marking the fifth anniversary of the invasion of South Korea in 1950.

THE PHILIPPINES

Joseph Scott, of Los Angeles, one of America's senior Catholic laymen, led the moral re-armament statesmen's mission when it arrived in the Philippines on June 27.

A dinner was given for the visiting representatives by the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives. The Senate President, Eulogio Rodriguez, in his speech of welcome, stated:

The hope of a turbulent Asia lies in the effect of such a force.

The mission was front-page news in the Philippine press and an hour was given for a national broadcast. Typical of the press comment was:

Joseph Scott, 87 years strong in the faith of his fathers and his family—Catholicism—gave a stirring message on the impact moral re-armament has on every religion—and in his Catholicism, its power to deepen and strengthen that faith in his life.

Another comment:

The Vanishing Island caught fire with the audience. It creates quite a vision of the future. A godless ideology is undoubtedly creeping over the islands of freedom. It must be stopped. The Vanishing Island proposes the solution. * * * The solution is not only worth a try. It is the only solution.

Niro Hoshijima, for 35 years a member of the Japanese Diet, apologized to the nation for the wrongs Japan had committed.

That is why my Prime Minister urged me to come on this mission. Please forgive us. Moral re-armament is already building a new Japan and with moral re-armament all Asia can unite.

The Manila Evening News in an article by the American columnist Winifred Bissinger gave these impressions of a thinking American living in Asia:

Saturday night we stepped off the cocktail party circuit and went to see the moral re-armament play, The Vanishing Island. It was the most rewarding experience of our life. MRA's musical is exceedingly cleverly conceived, magnificently presented propaganda for what, at this stage of an unhappy game, seems to be the answer—the only answer. Notably unsusceptible to propaganda—we hope—we can happily say we have fallen for this hook, line, and sinker. We left the Far Eastern University auditorium Saturday night in a glow. We could never wholeheartedly accept either of the world's two opposing ideologies. Of communism, we have a horror because we love freedom. In smug democracy, we have found many flaws. Here in moral re-armament we find an ideology we can accept—if only we were unselfish enough, decent enough, and—we must say it—good enough.

After the performance, several national groups of persons affiliated with the movement were introduced to the audience. They included highly respected statesmen, two former British admirals decorated for great heroism in the last war, resistance leaders and mineworkers. As outstanding and impressive a group of people we have never seen gathered together in all our newspaper experience.

Congressman Roseller T. Lim evaluated the visit in these words:

The coming of this mission at this time is the beginning of a tidal wave of change in the nations of Asia. I have decided to live MRA and with God's help I hope to give the rest of my life to it.

SINGAPORE

Conferences and meetings were held with the rival Malay and Chinese political parties, with heads of the chamber of commerce and trade-union leadership, and with educational and student leaders.

A reception, tendered by the president of the Chinese chamber of commerce, many of whose members have close family ties with Communist China, was attended by Singapore's chief minister, David Marshall, and other notables from the Malayan, Chinese, British, and Indian communities.

Mr. Thio Chan Bee, noted educationalist and former legislative council member, and one of those who was responsible through MRA for bringing the rival Malay and Chinese communities together after the war, joined the special plane as Singapore's representative on the world mission.

VIETNAM

With the people of South Vietnam only 12 months away from the fateful July 1956 deadline when they must vote for or against the Communist North, President Ngo Dinh Diem on July 5 welcomed as Government guests a delegation from the MRA world mission.

An hour after the special plane landed at Saigon Airport, the President and his Cabinet formally received the mission in the same Palace of Independence where recently he had turned the tide in his civil war. He said:

You are carriers of a noble ideal and powerful advocates for this idea—I would even say of a vast movement for the unity of men and nations. You have straightaway won the active sympathy of the Vietnam people. * * * For myself I understand the immense repercussions that will come from this mobilization of spiritual forces in the world which you have undertaken in effective cooperation with all men of good will. You have confronted an ideology that supposes to unite the world on the basis of hatred, fear, and strife with an idea which proclaims love and understanding and which proposes to bring about unity to the world by way of the heart and spirit.

In sharing your idea I have the firm conviction that a worldwide renaissance of moral and spiritual forces which we are all aiming for in the depths of our hearts, will be accomplished in the coming days, for the greatest benefit of us all. This will be the dawn of a new age which will see the transformation of the world.

Next morning, first anniversary of Diem's taking office after the Geneva armistice, he invited the mission to address the massed crowds from the palace steps. In his introduction he referred to MRA as "the great ideology that is sweeping the world."

That evening he gave a state banquet in honor of the MRA mission to which the diplomatic corps and chief Government leaders were invited.

Before leaving Saigon, members of the mission spent an afternoon with the Minister of War and 50 picked officers responsible for indoctrinating the country for next year's critical vote. The Chief of Psychological Warfare, Dr. Phuoc, said:

We were grateful for American military and economic aid, but lacked an ideology. Now you have given us the idea which can win.

THAILAND

In Thailand, keystone of SEATO, the MRA world mission were official guests of the Prime Minister, Field Marshal Pibulsonggram, who opened the Bangkok premiere of The Vanishing Island and welcomed his visitors "on behalf of my Government and the Thai people."

At a reception and dinner for the members of the mission, the Prime Minister referred to his visit to the MRA World Assembly at Caux, Switzerland, the month before. He declared that "peace-loving peoples will sooner or later yield to the ideology of MRA," which he described as "a strong force that answers world materialism." He continued:

Our honored guests are from all walks of life and are sacrificing themselves for the sake of the peace of mankind. The MRA mission aims to build up unity between nations and to bridge East and West. Its ideology is pure and sincere. Since its inception MRA has been growing larger and larger and will continue to grow with great force. The doors of Thailand will be gladly opened to MRA at all times.

In introducing the play at the theater of the Ministry of Culture, the Prime Minister declared:

The Vanishing Island is a remarkable play and teaches us a unique lesson. It will be a most potent weapon for casting away doubt and fear and so healing the differences between nations.

For the first time breaking a firm rule against attending theatrical productions, 15 members of the supreme Buddhist council, including the president of the council and other high priests of the Buddhist faith, attended the second performance of The Vanishing Island as the Prime Minister's personal guests. The president of the council said:

MRA has the same purpose for righteousness as the Lord Buddha. The ability of MRA to change men is proof that MRA has the power to unite the world.

Concluding their visit in this heart of the Buddhist world, which numbers some 400 million of Asia's population, the mission was received for 2 hours by the Lord Abbot of Wat Mahatat, one of the largest monasteries in the land, who said:

As a Buddhist, I take the greatest pleasure in receiving this mission. Our Buddhist faith teaches us to keep company with what is good, and from MRA I find in the four absolute standards something which is good. You can be assured that I shall be only too glad to serve you in any capacity. And I say this in front of the Lord Buddha. I am less lucky than you, because I am not able to accompany you. But I am happy you are accompanied by some who will be traveling on my behalf. It is a great tribute to Dr. Frank Buchman that a force like this can travel around the world—and such a strong force. This should be regarded as one of the great and important events in the history of humanity. Dr. Buchman is one of the great men of the world.

Among those present at the play were delegates to the current SEATO military talks.

BURMA

Prime Minister U Nu's official representative U Win, the Minister of National Planning, welcomed the world Mission to Burma.

Performances of the play The Vanishing Island were packed out with hundreds standing. All classes of Rangoon University were suspended for a special showing for more than 3,000 students.

The President of Burma, Dr. Ba U, gave a state presidential reception for the MRA mission and personally took a party of 16 to an overflow performance of the play.

Dr. Hla Tun, head of the Karen state government and Minister for Karen Affairs in the Federal Government, represents more than a million Karens, who have been in bitter dispute with the Federal Government since this country received its independence. In a statement to the MRA mission, Dr. Hla Tun said:

One failing has poisoned our national life—our hatred for our Burmese brethren. It is high time for us to face this matter squarely and get rid of this moral evil from within our hearts.

We are grateful for your coming. We thank you for the wonderful play The Vanishing Island. We are sure that without a moral basis there can be no real peace and cooperation. In these days of doubts, fears, and general pessimism your visit has cheered us and given us hope that a new world can be built.

A leading Burmese Communist commented after seeing The Vanishing Island:

I came here expecting to see a western play. But I found a great Burmese drama. It shows the way by which each one of us can change his nature.

An Asian Ambassador to Rangoon epitomized the East's response to the moral re-armament mission when he said:

I have looked down on the West with contempt. I thought the West with the hydrogen bomb was drawing us all to destruction. Last night when I saw The Vanishing Island and saw the Americans, South Africans, and all nations on the stage—particularly the Americans—all my prejudices vanished and my bitterness for the West went with them, too.

The Times of Burma stated editorially:

This idea has certainly found expression and struck a concordant note in the hearts and minds of millions of people. MRA is today a world force and stands unrivaled in the fight against moral decadence. It is a spiritual insurrection against a world enmeshed in the tentacles of hate, greed, or selfishness and intolerance.

CEYLON

The Prime Minister of Ceylon, Sir John Kotelawala, threw open the grounds of his residence, Temple Trees, in an official welcome to the moral re-armament world mission. Sir John became the seventh leader of Asian nations to give powerful support to the mission. He personally took a party of 50 people to the premiere of The Vanishing Island, including 6 members of the Cabinet and Chief Justice H. H. Basnayake.

Sir John said:

I hope that by employing MRA we shall have peace in the world so that people can walk it in freedom and majesty. We in Ceylon will learn from all of you.

Among others who attended the play were the Governor General of Ceylon, the president of the Senate, the leader of the House, the leader of the opposition, speaker of the house, the mayor of Colombo, many Members from both Houses of Parliament, general secretary of the Ceylon Trades Union Congress, representatives of the Ceylon Federation of Labor, Ceylon Workers Congress, and Ceylon Trade Union Federation.

Trade-union leaders traveling with the mission met separately with the principal officers of the 4 trade-union groups of Ceylon representing 400,000 workers of all political opinions.

Commented the Speaker of the House, Sir Albert Peries, on the nationwide impact of The Vanishing Island and MRA's Mission: "We need nothing in this island so much as we need MRA."

Leader of the opposition S. W. R. D. Bandaranaike summed up the universal response to the play when he said:

The brain and intellect of the world have outstripped the world's character in growth. With this play and the spirit of MRA you are developing the character of all mankind.

Before leaving by air for India, once again at the Prime Minister's invitation, the entire mission was entertained at his home estate.

357548—55763

INDIA

In Delhi the President of India, Dr. Rajendra Prasad, received members of the MRA ideological mission. Delegations from the mission were also entertained by the Vice President Dr. S. Radhakrishnan and Congress President U. N. Dhebar, as well as the leader of the Socialist Party of the House of the People, K. P. Kripalani, and Home Minister Pandit G. B. Pant, Minister of Labor Khandubhai Desai and the deputy chairman of the Planning Commission, Sir V. T. Krishnamachari. The latter stated:

The greatest problems today are conflicts between races and that is where MRA is bringing an answer. Its growth is inevitable.

During its four packed performances in Delhi The Vanishing Island was attended by a number of the members of Cabinet, as well as the Speaker of the House, G. V. Mavalankar, who describes moral re-armament as, "the old ancient way of the East. It has given our own philosophy a new orientation and it has given it wings."

Devadas Gandhi, son of Mahatma Gandhi, and editor of the Hindustan Times, arranged for the Mission a special showing of the film The Voice of India, the story of his father's life, for which MRA artists had contributed background music.

The Vanishing Island played to packed houses in Madras, Calcutta, and Delhi. A group of leading Madras citizens, including the mayor, the vice chancellor of Madras University, the president of the Motion Picture Producers Association of India and the general secretary of the Southern Railway Employees Union cabled from Madras to the Delhi performance:

Grateful your inspired visit to Madras. A widespread response to MRA here. Our best wishes for the success of the Mission in Delhi.

Eleven of the foremost papers have printed special MRA supplements ranging from 4 to 10 pages in the past 2 years. These include The Bombay Chronicle, the Hindu, The Hindusthan Standard of Delhi and Calcutta, The Advance, Indian Finance and Juguntar of Calcutta.

Mr. Tashar Kanti Ghosh, editor of the influential daily Amrita Bazar Patrika, said: "The world tour is an event of profound significance, particularly at this crucial moment in the history of the world. As far as India is concerned, your ideological Mission will be warmly appreciated." Reviewing the play the paper said:

The Vanishing Island depicts an answer to the very problems faced by the summit conference—conflict between democracies and dictatorships. The problems are presented with pungent satire in songs and humorous dialogue, and the solution is presented with a surprise that leaves a lasting impression.

The Times of India carried an illustrated account of the ideological Mission. Its dramatic critic wrote:

The grand way in which the story is treated, with such perfect team spirit even for a stupendous cast, is an example of grand showmanship worthy of emulation on the Indian stage.

The man who helped organize a demonstration against moral re-armament when the force came to Calcutta 2 years ago was on hand to welcome the MRA ideological Mission. Phani Gupta, a trade-union organizer, said:

I've spent most of my life in the Communist Party. I have fought in the streets and fields with sten guns and bombs for the liberation of my country but never found the answer. In MRA I found it. It's the most effective way of solving national and international problems.

A Delhi theater owner called the play an absolute masterpiece. An industrialist's comment was:

I saw all the ideological plays they are showing in China, but none touches this one.

The proprietor and editor-in-chief of the Hindu was host to a number of the Mission. His paper carried many columns on the Mission and the play.

A militant trade unionist who had been a member of the Communist Party said:

The Vanishing Island is the most powerful ideological drama I've ever seen. It's just like a rocket. It covers 95 percent of the problems we face in India today and brings a clear answer.

MRA is the answer to the need of the hour—said T. V. Anandhan, general secretary of the Southern Railway Employees Union. Anandhan, with 75 of his officials, welcomed labor members of the mission to union headquarters in Madras.

Addressing 400 students of Madras Christian College, the president of the student body, who visited Moscow last year, told of the change that had begun in his life since meeting moral re-armament. He said:

The aim of MRA is to revolutionize the world starting with change in the individual.

The Indian Express, with the largest circulation in the country, carried an excellently displayed article on the editorial page by Vincent Evans, former Washington bureau chief of the London Daily Express.

PAKISTAN

The Prime Minister of Pakistan, Mohammed Ali, gave a garden reception at his home to welcome the whole moral re-armament ideological mission. The reception was attended by several members of the cabinet, the diplomatic corps, chiefs of the armed services, and the judiciary.

Speaking on behalf of the 198 from 28 countries that arrived with the MRA Mission, Peter Howard, author of the MRA musical drama, The Vanishing Island, referred to the long friendship between Dr. Frank Buchman, initiator of MRA, and the late Mohammed Ali Jinnah, founder of Pakistan. He quoted the latter, who told Dr. Buchman in London, "Honest apology is the golden key. You have the answer to the hates of the world."

Among the other guests present were Mr. Ispahani, Minister of Industry, and Begum Ispahani; General Ayub Khan, Minister of Defense; Ibrahim Rahimtoola, Minister of Commerce; Adm. H. M. S. Choudri, commander in chief of the Royal Pakistan Navy; Air Vice Marshal MacDonald, commander in chief of the Royal Pakistan Air Force; Maj. Gen. Mohammed Musa, chairman of the joint chiefs of staff; the Ambassadors of Iraq and Iran; and Yussef Haroon, publisher of Dawn. Chaudri Mohammed Ali, Minister of Finance and incoming Prime Minister, received members of the Mission on the morning in which he announced the devaluation of the currency.

The Chief Minister of East Pakistan received a delegation from the Mission in Dacca saying:

You in MRA have a common ground on which all people can stand. You can be sure of a great response in our country.

The delegation was officially received by His Excellency Mr. Amiruddin Ahmed, Governor of East Pakistan, and 70 leaders in politics, industry, commerce, the diplomatic corps and the administration.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. Speaker, under general permission to extend remarks, I am submitting additional material completing my speech on the Moral Re-Armament statesmen's mission which was inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of August 1, 1955:

IRAN

The MRA world mission were personal guests of the Shah and Government of Iran.

In the official reception line at Teheran Airport were representatives of the court, the Prime Minister, the Foreign Minister, the services, the universities, and industrial, labor, and women's organizations.

A 2-hour national broadcast, directed by the Vice Premier and the Minister of Education, and keynoted by the President of the Supreme Court, inaugurated a visit described by Foreign Minister Entezam as "a world move to bring international relations into a new dimension."

Prime Minister Hussein Ala spent a morning with representatives of the mission. He said:

My Sovereign and Government are wholeheartedly with you in support of moral re-armament. We consider it a fundamental step toward uniting nations for the creation of peace which the common people of every land need and long for. What you are doing is perhaps the only hope of the world if we are to create understanding and prosperity for all peoples. The Koran and Islam sponsor and favor moral re-armament. You are showing the world how to put aside the old ideas of 19th century imperialism from which we have suffered in the Middle East and replace them with moral standards which are universal. You are giving a superior idea to communism and that is why you will succeed in winning the world.

The Minister of Education, Dr. Mohmoud Mehran, took first steps toward the ideological training of Iranian youth. He said:

Moral re-armament has a vital role to play in giving to our youth an ethical ideology which is the only answer to materialist ideas and propaganda.

Special lunches, dinners, and receptions were given in honor of the mission by the heads of every principal national organization and an extensive series of industrial visits brought them into touch with workers and managers on a factory level.

The Iranian premiere of The Vanishing Island was a command performance for the Shah and Queen Soraya given by royal order on a specially constructed stage in the grounds of the summer palace. The impact of the play was such that by imperial command the palace grounds were, for the first time in history, thrown open to the public to witness the last two performances of the play.

An Iranian Goverment delegation is being formed to attend the Caux Assembly in September.

Before leaving for Baghdad the mission were guests of the 50th anniversary celebrations of the Iranian Parliament, the Majlis.

IRAQ

Members of the MRA mission were guests of Burhanuddin Bashayan, Foreign Minister of Iraq, during a 4-day visit to this heart of the ancient world.

The Vanishing Island had its Baghdad premiere in the King Feisal II Theater before a cross-section of the governmental, diplomatic, industrial, and labor life of the capital.

Dr. Fadhil Jamali, former Premier and chief of his country's United Nations delegation, and who as Chairman of the Iraqi delegation at the Bandung conference has stood up to communism and has appealed for Asian-African unity on the basis of moral re-armament, gave a thought-provoking evaluation of the play to the press of Baghdad. The following is a translation from an interview by Dr. Jamali in Al Akhbar, leading Arabic daily of Baghdad:

Without doubt the theater is one of the most effective of the fine arts in propagating good character, the social virtues, and a lofty example to mankind. This is the task to which moral re-armament is actually applying itself. It portrays in its stage presentations a picture of human society, whether it be in the home, in the factory, in business, or in international relations, stating the problem and making clear the answer. It was my privilege to witness a number of these plays in America.

The day before yesterday I saw The Vanishing Island. Without doubt this play produces an amazing artistic effect and evokes real appreciation. The most important point about this play is its human, social, and political implications. The play presents two islands. One of them stands for democratic freedom, but materialism and selfishness have so led it astray that its people pay no attention to an imminent threat to their way of life. They do not believe that destruction peers at them from behind the door.

In the portrayal of this kingdom is a telling lesson for the anti-Communist countries which believe that they are right—completely right—forgetting that they themselves are ruled by materialism, selfishness, and exploitation.

The second act portrays a land under Communist government where dictatorship, slavery, and cruelty reign, where with the death of individual liberty human feelings are forgotten. Thus all of mankind is led along in slavery by chains of materialism.

These two regimes which are alike engulfed in materialism have no one to guide them aright. It is the good king of the first country who foretells the imminent danger to his island which is complacent in its freedom. When finally they refuse to accept the advice of their king, their island disappears and does not return until after they have repented and returned to their senses.

This good king is mankind's apostle and rescuer, the one who unites the social order, divided into leftist and rightist elements, by presenting a superior plan—a program of absolute purity, absolute love, and unselfishness among all the peoples of the world. Here the play ends by asking that the principles which MRA stands for be applied among all men. These principles are part of all the inspired religions. Together they are the essence of Islam, as they are of Christianity, Buddhism, and Hinduism. These principles are not the special property of any one religion or nation or geographical area, but are common to all mankind.

These principles are not new. What is new is that the world stands in greater need of them than ever before in history. In this atomic age mankind has before it the choice either to change human nature and thus to change human destiny by establishing these principles, or to continue to a war of extinction. Moral re-armament believes that the first thing to be effected is a change of character, and that this change is the effective way for individuals and societies. On this basis MRA is spreading in all parts of the world through a change of heart based on the light of God's guidance. This light of faith is the way which will save mankind from final destruction.

We absolutely cannot hold back from accepting this ideology presented by Moral Re-Armament. I urge that we all work together to purify and dedicate ourselves to absolute honesty, unselfishness, and love in all our work and in our family, social, economic, political, and international life. What this ideology calls for is a faithful confirmation of the verse from the holy Koran which says, "God does not change the condition of a nation until the men of that nation change themselves."

EGYPT

The mission were guests in Cairo of Lt. Col. Gamel Abdel Nasser, President of Egypt. He received the mission in his office in the presidency.

In a press interview given the following day Colonel Nasser said:

This ideology could be a solution to save the world from the conflict between the so-called West and East. We should all believe in it.

In his cable invitation he had said:

I wish to welcome to Egypt the delegation of Moral Re-Armament. Your principles and objectives are highly appreciated in Egypt where all efforts are mobilized to restore moral values, social justice, human dignity, and freedom.

The Governor of Cairo, Dr. Abdul El Latif Salem, and Dr. Abdel Khalek Hassouna, Secretary-General of the Arab League, headed a distinguished first-night audience at a gala performance of The Vanishing Island in Cairo's famous Opera House, built 80 years ago for the world premiere of Verdi's Aida on the occasion of the opening of the Suez Canal.

Earlier Dr. Hassouna was host at a reception for the mission. The Secretary-General, who is a former Foreign Minister of Egypt, in welcoming the mission on behalf of the Arab League, paid tribute to what had been accomplished in the last 2 months. He specially referred to Dr. Frank N. D. Buchman, initiator of Moral Re-Armament, and said:

We will be working with them through the four absolute standards of MRA for the salvation of humanity and the well-being of the whole of human kind.

Chinese Ambassador Ho Feng-shan, dean of the diplomatic corps, gave a dinner and said:

We have been talking about honesty and unselfishness for thousands of years, but these standards have not come into a concrete force as we see now in MRA. We have been talking too much and philosophizing without an effort to practice. Here is a force to inundate the world for generations to come.

Labor members of the mission were given a reception by 100 trade-union leaders at the headquarters of the Liberation Rally. Maj. M. Noor, Chief Provincial Officer for the Egyptian trade unions, declared:

I am absolutely dumbfounded by four words—the four words of the absolute standards. I want to help to give these to our whole country and the whole world.

At the close of the meeting the speakers were inundated with requests for literature and entire stocks were emptied.

The Minister of Education, Kemal Edin Hussein—youngest member of the Council of Revolution—gave a warm reception to members of the mission and told them, "It is a tremendous and worthwhile task you have undertaken." He proposed to translate MRA literature into Arabic for use in the schools and universities. He expressed the keenest appreciation at the presence of the 32 Egyptian students sent to Caux by President Nasser.

"Images" of Cairo, leading pictorial magazine of the Middle East, carried 3 pages of pictures of The Vanishing Island and commented:

The admiration this play inspires has been expressed in superlative terms—"a resurrection of the theater," "brings renaissance to nations," "greatest spectacle of our time." In Cairo, where it was invited by Prime Minister Nasser, its success has been equally brilliant. Symbolizing a new dimension in international relations, it has made an indelible impression on the capital.

In Alexandria, commercial and industrial center of Egypt, the enthusiastic audiences at the play included the Governor of Alexandria, the Chief of Staff of the Egyptian Armed Forces, the admiral commanding the Egyptian Navy, the Governor of the Bank of Egypt, and officials of the ruling Liberation Rally who came by invitation of their chief, Lesy Abdel Nasser, brother of the President.

KENYA

Nineteen hours after closing at Cairo, the cast of The Vanishing Island opened before a packed multiracial audience in the Kenya National Theater in Nairobi, 2,500 miles south of Cairo, where the Governor of Kenya, Sir Evelyn Baring, received members of the Moral Re-Armament mission.

Kenya officials greeted the entire mission of 192 on their arrival. Mayor I. Somen welcomed the party on behalf of the city of Nairobi. A. B. Patel, Minister for Asian Affairs in the Kenya Cabinet, and Alan Knight, commandant of the Athi River Mau Mau detention camp, were also at the airport.

At the Athi River camp, 500 hard core Mau Mau leaders had earlier renounced their Mau Mau oaths as a result of applying Moral Re-Armament principles, and Knight brought 24 pounds sterling which had been contributed in shillings and pence by 150 detainees to help finance the mission. The men earn only 1 shilling a day.

Hon. Michael Blundell, minister without portfolio and member of the Emergency War Council, came to the theater to express the warmth of his welcome to Kenya, while Cabinet Minister Patel told a gathering of the Asian community:

Under the inspiring leadership of Dr. Frank Buchman, MRA has made great strides in the last years. It is an ideology essential to the progress of the human race if we are to establish peace.

At the premiere, former Communists, Africans, Asians, Europeans, and Maoris from New Zealand all spoke from the stage. The first members of the mission to be introduced were Mary Waruhiu, daughter of a senior Kikuyu chief, and Mrs. Agnes Hofmeyr, daughter of a famous English settler. The fathers of both had been murdered by the Mau Mau.

At the camp a group from the mission, including Congressman CHARLES B. DEANE of North Carolina and Basil Okwu, Member of the Eastern Nigeria Parliament spoke to 1,500 detainees gathered in the camp theater, giving their own experience of MRA and of its uniting impact across the world.

The climax of the mission's visit in Kenya was an open air meeting for members of the Kikuyu tribe, heart of the Mau Mau revolt, when 7,000 crowded a grassy hillside in the Kikuyu Reserve at 24 hours' notice on the invitation of Chief Simon Waruhiu and his brother David. Hundreds of thousands of Africans later heard the meeting by radio.

TURKEY

Invited by the Turkish Government, members of the mission visited Istanbul and Ankara, modern capital of the country on the plains of Anatolia.

Following the thunderous ovation from the packed theater in Istanbul, Dr. Bahrettin Goekay, Governor of Istanbul, spoke from the stage. He said, "I believe Turkey will be the greatest exponent of MRA among all the nations. There will be no limit to what MRA can do in Turkey."

The ecumenical patriarch, Athenagoras I, head of the 250 million Christians of the Eastern Orthodox Church, received members of the mission at his official residence in this ancient capital of the Eastern Empire, and said, "Moral Re-Armament is the agency which is bringing a new world to birth. Tell Dr. Buchman we believe in him and thank God for him and for all he has done and is doing for the world. Yours is a modern apostolic mission. You have found the secret of life."

In Ankara the mission were guests of honor on Turkey's Victory Day at the Hippodrome where 5,000 picked troops demonstrated the armed strength of the Turkish nation. After the parade the Deputy Prime Minister and former Foreign Minister, Dr. Fuat Koprulu, received the entire mission. "You are serving the sublime cause of an ideology which has opened new horizons for all humanity. The play last night made a terrific impact on our nation," he said. "Rearming is not enough. In the world today we need moral re-armament to complete it. You understand this and the day will come when all the world will realize it."

The Governor of Ankara, Kemal Aygun, added, "Since your play came here everyone in Ankara wants to be a part of MRA." The Chief of Staff of the Turkish Air Force, Gen. Tekim Ariburun, acted as interpreter for the Governor as he spoke from the stage following the play.

Speaking to the audience, Representative CHARLES B. DEANE, of North Carolina, said, "The choice before the nations today is moral re-armament or world communism. The ideology of this play is the strength of democracy and the hope for a new world."

Apparently there is quite a lot of excitement about Abbé Pierre, who evidently has made somewhat of a stir in France. He is a very picturesque character and perhaps he has already been mentioned to you as a possibility for exhibit on "See it Now".

FOR RELEASE ON DELIVERY

Press Release #2077
December 10, 1954

Statement by The Honorable A. M. Ade Johnson, Alternate United States Representative, in Committee III on Forced Labor in Communist China.

Mr. Chairman:

This Twentieth Century in which we are living came as an era of great hope for the human race. Much that has been beyond our grasp for so long in our history seems at last within reach. Many of our hopes for this century have been fulfilled or are on the way to fulfillment. Technologically we have learned a great deal. We have made vast strides in medicine, and we are able to prevent, control and cure diseases that once had the power to ravage whole cities and even nations. We are able to produce ever-greater quantities of food for our expanding world population. In other fields, too, we have seen some dreams come true. At the end of the first World War, a number of new sovereign nations came into being, in line with the principle of self-determination of peoples. And within the past decade we have seen the emergence of still more free nations. That the distinguished representatives of the Philippines, of India, of Burma, of Pakistan, of Indonesia and a number of other governments are here in this Assembly, playing a vital and essential role in our critical deliberations, is clear testimony of the changes and progress of our century.

It is within this setting that we have to consider the phenomenon which we call "forced labor." And within this setting of progressive enlightenment, the thing that we call "forced labor" looms as a dark, ominous and cruel shadow. It is not the first time we have had to take a look at this question. We are already familiar with it. And yet each time it arises most of us, I am sure, are overtaken by feelings of shock that such a thing exists in our century. Old-fashioned slavery was long ago repudiated and outlawed by most of the world. Where it survives it is only as a remnant of a way of life which the civilized world long ago abandoned. But this thing which we call forced labor exists on a huge scale. It involves uncounted millions of helpless human beings. And it is an instrument of concerted government policy in a contiguous region of the world where nearly one billion people live.

It is certainly one of the paramount obligations of our United Nations to seek paths, day in and day out, for closer understanding between nations and differing political systems. But there are aspects of differing political concepts which permit of no compromise whatsoever. I am deeply convinced of the principle that our world cannot forever endure "half slave and half free." Either this world will continue its progress toward the freedom which the Twentieth Century promised, or it will succumb to the concept of man as a demeaned, inconsequential creature whose destiny is to live, work and die at the bidding of those who wield political power. Whether we speak of these things in the United Nations or not, these two concepts are in real and serious conflict with one another. We cannot fail to take sober notice of this conflict.

Mr. Chairman, the General Assembly last year discussed this question at some length. This past spring, the Economic and Social Council examined the report of the Ad Hoc Committee on Forced Labor. There is no need, under the circumstances, to recapitulate the familiar facts in regard to forced labor within the Soviet Union and its satellites. Those facts are clear enough for all to see and ponder.

It is also a matter of record that the Soviet Union has refused to make any substantive reply to communications from the Ad Hoc Committee and the Secretary-General concerning forced labor within the Soviet Union. No matter what interpretation the Soviet Union places on its action, I think the real significance of the refusal is apparent to all.

-- Forced Labor in Communist China --

Today I want to turn the spotlight on the manner in which the forced labor system, so ingeniously developed and refined under Soviet communism, has been imposed upon a nation of more than six hundred million people in Asia. This nation is Communist China. Under the current communist regime in Peiping, Communist China has fallen victim to the full fury of this legally-sanctioned savagery. The manifold purposes of forced labor under the Chinese Communists are -- as in the Soviet Union -- to provide a vast horde of human arms, backs and legs to perform construction tasks at an absolute minimum cost; to eliminate from the population at large all those who have opposed or who might oppose the policies of the regime; to hold over the heads of the Chinese people, day and night, the threat of the direst punishment for the slightest action or expression against the government; and to reconstitute the Chinese society into an absolute monolithic state in which the individual lives only for the purpose of supporting the regime which controls him. Forced labor in China, is, in short, an instrument for political control, for public terror, and for implementation of economic programs.

It would be hard to know exactly how many millions of helpless Chinese of all classes -- former landowners, former civil servants, former business men, former soldiers of the National Government, and former farmers -- are today in Peiping's slave labor camps, or how many are serving at compulsory labor outside the camps. We know that the number is large, and much of our information comes directly from spokesmen of China's communist regime.

-- Economic Importance --

With a candor born of inexperience, the Chinese Communist leaders have spread profusely on the record the manner in which they have used the forced labor system as a means of fulfilling economic plans. The Peiping People's Daily Jen Min Jih Pao -- the official organ of the Chinese Communist Party -- on September 7 of this year revealed that more than 83% of the persons in confinement throughout the country had been assigned to forced labor. The People's Daily specified that these individuals had been put to work cutting timber, constructing buildings, restoring and building water conservation installations, railways and highways. The economic value of this slave-labor force to the regime was revealed in the meeting of the Government Administration Council on August 26, 1954, by Lo Jui-Ching, Peiping's Minister of Public Security, who ennumerated a few of the production totals for the year 1953. He noted that slave laborers had produced in 1953 two billion bricks, 770 million tiles, 4,284,000 pairs of socks, and 1,700,000 couplers for steam radiators. Lo Jui-Ching also reported that many new farms had been established for forced labor, a number with more than 10,000 mou (1666 acres) of land, and that considerable numbers of forced labor industrial units had been established. He reported that many so-called "engineering corps" had been created for the repair of conservation works, lumbering, railroad building and the construction of state buildings.

- Extent of Forced Labor in Communist China -

Other reports indicate the vast extent of this system. As early as October 24, 1951, Radio Chungking announced that more than 19,000 prisoners in the South Szechuan area had been put to compulsory work of various kinds, with another 7,500 prisoners performing labor for the army. A late 1954 report states that a labor-reform camp near Yingte, Kwangtung, established in 1950, had become the second largest such camp in Central and South China, with approximately 70,000 slave laborers.

In March 1953 forced labor was reported on railway construction jobs in Kansu Province in Northwest China. Another recent report on camps in Szechuan includes those at Chungking with 11,000 forced laborers and Chengtu with 10,000. A camp at Kantzu in Sikiang province is reported to have 10,000. Forced labor camps have also been reported at Fenghsu near Amoy, Chinchiting, Hoshan-Tungpu, Tenghsien, Kashgar and Sulo. Forced labor camps reported in Heilungchian include those at Tetu, with over 15,000 slave laborers, Sunwu with 8,000, and Hsurhochen with 4,000.

Even with the fragmentary information available, it is clearly apparent that the slave labor system is firmly established on the Chinese mainland. And, Mr. Chairman, what we have to deal with is not just statistics. These figures I have mentioned represent human beings. The figures themselves are so overwhelming that by the time we come to the end of them it is difficult to remember that we aren't talking about bushels of rice, or about rupees, but about men and women, young and old.

- Forced Labor Under Sentence of Death -

You recall, I am sure, that representatives of the Labor Party of the United Kingdom visited China recently. Those visitors saw some of the slave laborers in action. One member of the visiting group was Rene MacColl, a correspondent of the London Daily Express. Here is his description of what he saw — I am quoting:

"Here were half-naked men working with a ferocious determination and concentration such as I have never seen elsewhere. The way in which they went through a sort of drill, shuffling and moving to a pattern, was first impressive and then frightening. It was like a speeded-up film by some satirical director bent upon exposing the soullessness of big business.

"Then came the chief warden's casual revelation: about two-thirds of the several thousand men and women in the jail were political prisoners; and many of the political prisoners were under sentence of death.

"We began to understand the prisoners' total absorption in their tasks. It was explained that the death sentence was held in abeyance for a two-year period in order to see if the prisoner 'truly and sincerely would see the error of his ways and genuinely embrace the concepts of the People's New China.' If he did, the prisoner could expect commutation of his sentence to life imprisonment."

Mr. Chairman, the British correspondent's information about deferred death sentences hanging like a guillotine over the heads of the helpless slave labor prisoners is well substantiated. This diabolical device is an integral part of the system. Let me quote to you what the Peiping People's Daily has to say on this subject:

"Deferment of two years does not mean immediate release after two years. Based upon the accomplishment during these two years, decision will be made as to whether the execution of the death sentence will be carried out. If it is found that the work they achieved is not satisfactory, or that they refuse to reform, they can be executed at any time. And even if they show willingness to be reformed, their conviction can also be commuted to life imprisonment...."

I suggest that in the darker periods of human history, when old-fashioned slavery was acceptable to some peoples, we had nothing quite comparable to this ugly inhumanity. Men and women from all walks of life are rounded up because they are regarded as enemies or possible enemies of the regime in power, because they have not learned that in this kind of state there is only one view that can be voiced -- that of the regime itself. They are divested of what Peiping calls "political rights" -- that means, divested of legal and humanitarian protections of any kind -- and assigned to hard labor for life, or for as long as the regime wishes, or until the state decides to liquidate them altogether. As long as they live they are called upon to be "reformed," to have their brains washed, to criticise themselves, to make confession upon confession, to demean their human spirit, and to give every ounce of physical energy to the work assigned by the regime in the faint hope that the regime will relent.

-- Political Purpose, Enunciated by Mao Tse-tung --

This thing did not happen by accident. It was not something that just occurred. It has nothing whatever to do with the basic character of the Chinese people, any more than the forced labor system in the Soviet Union has to do with the character of the Soviet peoples. This nightmarish device was planned and replanned. On July 1, 1949 -- even before he achieved absolute power -- Mao Tse-tung enunciated the basic principle of the forced labor institution he intended to impose on China. In his essay "On People's Democratic Dictatorship" he declared:

> "All the experiences of the Chinese people, accumulated in the course of successive decades, tell us to carry out a people's democratic dictatorship. This means," Mao said, "that the reactionaries must be deprived of the right to voice their opinions; only the people have that right. Those belonging to reactionary classes or groups would be given a chance to reform themselves through labor into new persons -- but only on condition that they do not rebel, sabotage, or create disturbances."

This policy, Mao explained, could be referred to as "benevolent policy," but it would be "compulsorily imposed upon those originally from enemy classes... If they do not want to work, the People's State will force them to do so."

Mao's basic principle was incorporated three months later in an official document called the "Common Program," and adopted by the Political Consultative Conference on September 29, 1949. That document provided for the suppression of so-called "counter-revolutionary activities," and it spelled out some of the things it had in mind. I quote from Article 7:

> "Reactionary elements, feudal landlords, bureaucratic capitalists in general must, according to law, also be deprived of their political rights within a necessary period after they have been disarmed and their special power abolished, but they shall at the same time be given a means of living and compelled to reform themselves through labor to become new men..."

—"People" and "Non-People" in Communist China —

I would like to diverge for a moment here to take note of the peculiar context in which these documents refer to "men" and "people." There appear to be two classes of creatures in China having the outward characteristics of human beings. First, there are what Mao Tse-tung calls "the people," members and supporters of the communist party, and those who make no overt resistance to the dictatorship imposed on them. Then there are the "non-people" -- those who, for whatever political or social reason, are regarded as undesirable or dangerous to the regime. These include all who oppose the regime, or who voice opposition sentiment, or who may have been in the civil service or army of the National Government, and so on. The Chinese communist press and radio, over a long period of time, referred to open anti-communists in the country as "wild beasts." It reported every so often to the fact that so many thousand "wild beasts" had been slaughtered by communist forces. What we have here, among other things, is an ideological rationale for slavery and arbitrary mistreatment. Those sentenced to forced labor are not really people, according to the doctrine, and therefore, the communists say, we need have no further concern for them -- unless here and there, perhaps, a convict may be able to wash his brain so thoroughly and work so hard that he may -- conditionally -- again be considered a part of the human race. It is in this context that Mao's statement that only the "people" have the right to voice their opinions becomes clear.

The punitive drive against the non-people in Communist China, those branded as "counter-revolutionaries," was further elaborated on February 21, 1951, in a law entitled "Regulations of the People's Republic of China for the Punishment of Counter-Revolutionaries." These regulations spelled out in greater detail who were the "people" and who were not. They broadened the number of punishable offenses to include virtually anyone whom the regime might desire to punish. Counter-revolutionaries now included not only capitalists, landlords and other so-called "reactionary elements," but also those who fabricate and spread rumors, instigate resistance to labor service, conduct "counter-revolutionary propaganda and agitation," alienate and split the solidarity between the government and the nationalities, democratic classes, parties and groups, and the like.

Under the principle of retroactivity, a man could be condemned for an act committed before the law itself had been conceived. Thus a person who at any time in his life had publicly uttered sentiments contrary to communist policy in 1951 would be liable to punishment. Under the principle of analogy, a man could be punished for an act not even specified in the regulations, but which resembled in some way the punishable acts which were cited.

In short, they incorporated into Communist China basic elements of the Soviet forced labor system -- the term "counter-revolutionary" as a term to embrace all those "class-enemies" who disagree with the detailed plans of the party, the retroactive nature of laws and the extension of the laws through analogy.

While they thus established a legal basis to punish opposition to the policies of the regime, and to punish the expression of opinions contrary to those of the regime, the rulers of Communist China did not bother to provide for any legal measures establishing forced labor as a punishment or specifying the conditions under which persons might be sentenced to forced labor camps. The Regulations of 1951 were silent on this point, although they have in fact served as the basis for the extensive system of forced labor Communist China has carried on since 1949.

-- Forced Labor Law Adopted August 26, 1954 --

Finally, on the basis of all of this experience, the Peiping regime got around to "legalizing" its slave labor system. On August 26 of this year, Chinese communist leaders completed the drafting of a law intended to make slave labor a legal and permanent institution. This law, passed by the 222nd Meeting of the Government Administration Council, is called "Regulations Governing Labor Service for Reform of the People's Republic of China."

Translations of the text of this law, and of supplementary regulations for dealing with the release of forced laborers at the termination of their sentences, have been submitted to the Secretary-General by the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions and circulated directly by that Organization to delegations. The ICFTU has also submitted to the Secretary-General, and circulated to delegations, the speech of Minister Lo Jui-ching in which he presented the law to the Council, as well as an editorial from the Peiping People's Daily urging its rapid implementation.

Because these documents are already available, I will limit my remarks to some of the most important aspects of the new law.

In its own language, the purpose of the forced labor regulations is to punish all "counter-revolutionary criminals and other criminals through labor service to become new people."

-- Thought Control --

The law carefully states what was already the practice under the Common Program -- that is, the intention of the regime to compel the prisoners to change their political opinions. This political character is openly ascribed to the punishment, both in the regulations and in the commentaries made on them. Article 25 makes it most explicit, calling for the coordination of forced labor with political and ideological education so the criminals may be "reformed into new men." The "reform" is to be carried out through collective study classes, individual interviews, study of assigned documents, and organized discussions (Article 26) for at least one hour a day 28 days a month (Article 52).

The comments of the People's Daily with respect to this policy were that the Communist Party must carry out "various effective measures to transform the various evil ideological conceptions in the minds of the people, so that they may be educated and reformed into new people. The enforcement of compulsory labor service for reform among the criminals during the period of their confinement is one of the most effective means to achieve such an end."

-- Economic Plans --

The intention to employ forced labor in accordance with the economic plans of the state is equally well stated. As in the USSR, the rulers of Communist China are assuring themselves of a vast pool of cheap labor upon which they can plan when constructing their economic programs. That such utilization of forced laborers will not be forgotten is assured by Article 30 of the Regulations, which specifies: "Production in labor service for reform shall serve the interests of national economic construction, and be included in the state's general production and construction plans." The plans for using forced laborers are to be drawn up in accordance with guidance from the various departments of the government (Article 31). Specific priority is given to agricultural production; industrial, mining and porcelain production enterprises; and water conservancy, road building, and other construction projects (Article 33). Forced laborers may be transferred from one area and one type of employment to another (Article 35).

Juveniles from the ages of 13 to 18 are also to perform "light labor service" while being given an "education in politics, in the new moral code, and in basic cultural subjects and production techniques" (Article 22).

- Forced Labor Institutions -

Aside from special institutions for juveniles, there are three major types of forced labor institutions corresponding generally to the places of ordinary imprisonment, forced labor camps, and forced labor colonies of the USSR. The institution for the relatively minor crimes, calling for sentences of two years or less, is the "detention house" (Article 8). Apparently there was some objection to the utilization of these jails, for Minister Lo Jui-ching found it necessary in his statement before the Government Administration Council to defend them on the basis that they were also included in the forced labor legislation of the Soviet Union.

The most serious offenders — those having been sentenced to death or lengthy terms -- are to be placed in prisons, made to do compulsory labor service and to receive education under the principle of rigid control (Articles 13-14).

The third institution, most comparable to the vast slave labor camps of the USSR, is known as the "labor service for reform corps." The mass of "counter-revolutionaries and other criminals suited for labor service in the open" including, apparently, many with sentences only up to two years, are to be put into the camps and colonies of the reform corps (Article 17). It is through this institution — and under its own MVD — that Communist China is undoubtedly building in its northwest provinces the Communist Chinese counterpart of the great Siberian slave labor empire of the Soviet secret police.

How large such an empire may be is also reflected in the Regulations, Article 20 of which specifies that on the basis of the number of criminals and the needs of production, forced labor corps may be organized into small companies, medium companies, large companies, branch companies, and General Corps. Forced labor corps of 3000 or more prisoners in isolated areas are envisaged in such numbers that it was found necessary to include four articles on them (Articles 63-66).

- Regulations Governing Forced Laborers -

Forced laborers are to work from 9 - 10 hours daily, or as much as 12 hours daily in seasonal production activities; they are to get only one day of rest every two weeks (Article 52). This means a work week of a minimum of 58½ hours. Add the minimum of 6½ hours political education per week and the total work week comes to a minimum of 65 hours. A speed-up system is introduced under the guise of "production competitions" (Article 28). The Chinese slave laborers receive no pay. This is not made clear in the regulations but was pointedly stated in the accompanying editorial in the following words: "Such labor is forced, and without compensation, and carried out under strict control." As in the USSR, forced laborers will be assigned work norms (Article 68). Whether food rations will be tied to these norms is not specified.

Other built-in compulsions for rigorous application to assigned work and rapid reform of thinking almost make the crude pressure of work norms unnecessary in any case. The deferment of the execution of death penalties for two years, during which the prisoner is called upon to prove his regeneration through hard work and reform of his thoughts, is retained (Article 13). An elaborate system of reporting on the maintenance of discipline, and attitudes toward labor and study is specified (Article 29). Forced laborers are encouraged to report on each other to prison authorities in hope of being extolled, given material rewards, credited with a note of merit, having sentences reduced, or being paroled (Article 68).

MORE

- Arbitrary Retention After End of Sentence -

On the other hand, a forced laborer must have done more than simply serve his sentence as specified by law in order to be released. As a matter of fact, almost no one who is sentenced to forced labor may assume that he will be allowed to return to his home as a free man on the completion of his sentence, no matter how "actively" he engaged in forced labor or how studious he was in correcting his thoughts.

To begin with: If he has been sent to a forced labor camp in a "large and sparsely populated district," he can be held there arbitrarily, regardless of how he has served his sentence (Article 2 of the Provisional Measures for Dealing with Release of Criminals) and even if he has a family to return to elsewhere (Article 7, same).

Even if he is not in a camp in a "large and sparsely populated district," and even if he has served his sentence satisfactorily, he may still be held arbitrarily unless he has a definite home or vocation to return to (Article 62). One of the more cynical reasons for these provisions, which make it possible to retain the great bulk of prisoners indefinitely, was revealed by Minister Lo Jui-ching when he said: "Not only will certain criminals be relieved of anxiety for employment on the expiry of their sentence, but the state will also have its difficulties reduced in dealing with the unemployment problem."

Besides these general authorizations for the arbitrary retention of forced laborers, other provisions are set forth to extend sentences of those who have not satisfied the regime during their imprisonment. Any important "counter-revolutionary" criminal, habitual robber or thief who fails to engage "actively" in forced labor, frequently violates prison regulations, or fails to reform, can have his sentence extended by local courts (Article 72). Open resistance to forced labor without repenting after "repeated education" requires reporting to local people's courts for "attention according to law," (Article 71) and any new evidence discovered during his internment apparently can result in a lengthening of his sentence (Article 43).

In summary, a forced laborer can only be assured of release at the end of his sentence if he is not in a camp in a sparsely settled area, has a home or job to return to, has worked "actively" at forced labor, has had his opinions corrected, and has been a model prisoner. Otherwise, he can be held indefinitely.

- Participation of USSR in Establishing System -

Mr. Chairman, this institution of forced labor which has been imposed on the Chinese people bears marked similarities to the forced labor institution in the Soviet Union. We may take note of the fact that the phrase "counter-revolutionary criminals" embraces all persons who do not agree with the regime, or whose social origins are not acceptable. It corresponds closely to what the Russians call "class enemies" in Article 1 of the Soviet Corrective Labor Code. We have noted that the various types of forced labor confinement places in China have already been institutionalized in the Soviet Union. There are innumerable other similarities throughout. This is no accident. Soviet practices in regard to forced labor have been used as a model and a tested precedent. Nor did it end there. I want to quote to you from the statement made by Lo Jui-ching, the Peiping Minister of Public Security, when he submitted his report on the new draft law to the Government Administration Council. Mr. Lo said — and I am now quoting exactly:

"During the process of preparation, assistance was received from Soviet legal experts, and many discussions were held and revisions made."

That is a short sentence, easily overlooked in the long texts which have been distributed. But I call your special attention to it. It is something to think about. While Soviet representatives in the United Nations were denying the existence of forced labor in the USSR, Soviet representatives in Communist China were extending a perverted "technical assistance" to extend the Soviet system of forced labor to that country.

I believe this reveals, more clearly than anything I could say, the reality that the world cannot remain forever in balance part slave and part free. What we are looking at here is an abhorrent system of slave labor spreading from the place of its origin to another continent. It now blankets all of mainland China, with a population of more than 600 million people.

- Albanian Forced Labor -

We have already seen how the slave labor doctrine was exported from the Soviet Union into its satellite states in Eastern Europe. We have had reports on all of these states except one, Albania. Poland, Czechoslovakia, Hungary, Bulgaria, Rumania -- all have been infected with this cruel disease. One might have thought that the tiny country of Albania, with a polulation of 1,300,000, would escape the plague. It was not so. No area under Soviet control or operating under Soviet doctrine has escaped, neither the great population of China nor the small population of Albania. Ever since the end of World War Two, forced labor has been carried out in Albania under a variety of laws for both political and economic purposes. The Albanian penal code adopted by the People's Assembly on May 23, 1952, provided a stable and systematized basis for slave labor. Here again the hand of the teacher and master is seen. The Albanian Minister of Justice, Bilbil Klose, declared when this law was submitted for approval that it embodied the familiar Soviet principles of class warfare and revolutionary justice.

The Albanian penal code frankly states its purpose as that of preserving the "dictatorship of the proletariat." Major penalties under the code are death, imprisonment, and internment at "corrective labor" camps. All of the familiar characteristics of Soviet slave labor practices are present. There are some 40 political prisons and concentration camps, which have been in operation since the end of the war. Over 80,000 men, women and children have gone into these camps, It is estimated that 16,000 people in the camps have perished. At present, around 10,000 persons are probably serving in political prisons, and another 10,000 to 15,000 in concentration camps.

Mr. Chairman, I do not have the time to go into any great detail here on the subject of forced labor in Albania. But we do have a great deal of information on this subject. My Government intends to submit evidence in writing to the Secretary General, in the near future, on the purposes, extent and operation of forced labor in Albania as well as in Communist China.

Much of what I have had to say today may seem unreal as we sit here in this comfortable room. It is truly fantastic in this enlightened Twentieth Century, but it is real.

Some may ask themselves, "What does it profit us to raise this specter in the United Nations?" My answer is that we do not raise it, it has raised itself. There is no way of pretending that slave labor does not exist. It exists, as many millions of unfortunate, helpless people in Europe and Asia know too well. We may not escape facing it. Certainly this Committee, which is concerned with human problems -- with basic rights, with fundamental freedoms, with slavery, self-determination, refugees, and freedom of information--cannot close its eyes to such a primordial violation of the human spirit. Remote as slave labor may seem to some of us who have been born and have always lived in an atmosphere of liberty, we cannot be unconcerned with it, any more than we can be unconcerned with cholera, leprosy, and yellow fever.

We may take note that while there has been no change in the system there appears to have been some amelioration in the treatment of forced laborers in the Soviet Union. Perhaps our discussions here in the United Nations have had something to do with it. It is hard to know. But we must continue our efforts, in behalf of the little people of this world in whose interest -- in the last analysis -- the United Nations was founded.

UNITED STATES DELEGATION TO THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY

FOR RELEASE ON DELIVERY
CHECK TEXT AGAINST DELIVERY

Press Release No. 2083
December 14, 1954.

Statement by the Honorable James F. Green, Acting United States Representative, in Committee III, on Forced Labor.

Mr. Chairman:

The Communist representatives have had three things to say about my country's comments on forced labor and about the Ad Hoc Committee itself.

First -- they have claimed that the United States is the source of real forced labor. Perhaps through their Marxian eyes they really believe this. I can only say that they should look about them more closely. The United States has no fear of the facts. It answered all allegations made to the Ad Hoc Committee and it has answered all these charges before.

The United States has never claimed to be perfect. There is, of course, some unemployment, there is some discrimination, some poverty, some other abuses. But we do not have forced labor. Our political and religious ideologies are in opposition to all such abuses and we are continually making programs. The Communists, on the other hand, have made forced labor part of their laws.

Several of this group of Representatives have commented on the status of the Negro in the United States, although they did not make clear just what this subject has to do with our agenda on forced labor. It is quite true that our Negro citizens have not yet achieved full equality in every field of activity in this country. It is also quite true that our Negro citizens are moving steadily ahead, year by year, under our democratic processes. I am proud to see Ralph Bunche receive a Nobel Prize for his services to the United Nations. I am proud to read that Marian Anderson will sing this winter at the Metropolitan Opera. But I am even prouder when the Supreme Court knocks down the barriers to Negroes in American schools. I am prouder when I see the steady progress forward of our Negro citizens.

Mr. Chairman, slavery was ended in the United States some 90 years ago. In fact, the traditional forms of slavery have long since disappeared in most regions of the world, although - as several speakers pointed out in our debate on the Report of the Economic and Social Council - vestiges of slavery still remain in some countries. The tragedy is that a new form of slavery has been developed and perfected in the Soviet Union, in the States of Eastern Europe, and in Communist China today -- in the middle of the Twentieth Century. There is no question whatever in my mind that the lot of a Negro today in this country is far better than the lot of a slave in a slave labor camp in the Soviet Union or in Communist China. As a matter of fact, the average Negro earns about three times the amount of the ordinary Soviet citizen even outside the forced labor camps.

MORE

Second -- they have abused the members of the Ad Hoc Committee. They have maligned the integrity of distinguished citizens of India, Peru, and Norway. The Chairman of the Ad Hoc Committee, Sir Rama Swami Mudaliar of India, has been an outstanding figure in the economic and social work of the United Nations and he is well known to many of us personally for his intelligence and integrity. The Representatives who cast aspersions on the members of the Ad Hoc Committee have not, however, challenged the facts on the basis of which their conclusions were made. The Ad Hoc Committee cited these facts accurately and they cannot be repudiated by the Communists.

Third -- they claimed the remarks of the United States were slanderous. The Communist representatives have tried to take all the meaning out of such words as freedom, rights, democracy, and people. They are now trying to change the meaning of slanderous.

Almost everything our representative, Mr. Johnson, said last Saturday was taken directly, often in verbatim quotations, from official Chinese Communist and Albanian Communist sources. If the facts are slanderous, the complaints should be addressed to the Chinese Communists themselves and not to the United States Delegation.

The Communist delegates have carefully avoided making any direct comments on forced labor in their territories.

The Representative of Byelorussia admitted the existence of the Corrective Labor Codes in the USSR. I would appreciate hearing what prisoners in forced labor camps and colonies or those exiled under these laws are doing if they are not at forced labor.

I would like to hear explanations of the meanings of the Penal Codes and the Corrective Labor Codes of Poland and Czechoslovakia if they are not regarded by their representatives as forced labor laws.

I would like to know the Communist explanation of the Chinese Communist "Regulations Governing Labor Service for Reform" if they are not forced labor regulations.

Finally, Mr. Chairman, the Representative of the Ukraine told us that there was complete freedom to express political views in the USSR. If he is correct we would all rejoice. I wonder whether a person in the USSR could in fact freely support a non-communist candidate against Malenkov as Premier or suggest the return of capitalism. I note that the Representative of the Ukraine also confirmed, however, that persons arrested in the USSR are made to do "labor service for the State". The Byelorussian referred to "mythical millions" of forced laborers. If there is no extensive forced labor in the USSR, its Representatives could clarify that fact quickly by telling us exactly how many persons are in their corrective labor camps, colonies, and in exile. If there are no more than would ordinarily be expected to be in jails and prisons in a democratic state, the burden of the case would fall of its own weight.

As to the correspondent of the New York Times who visited Siberia and reported that he saw no forced labor, the facts are that he had two separate, full-page articles of forced labor, including pictures of some of the camps.

Explanation on the Draft of Regulations
Governing Labor Service for Reform

by

Lo Jui-ching

Vice Chairman of the Committee of Political and Legal Affairs, GAC, and Minister of Public Security

(Report before the 22nd meeting of the Government Administration Council on August 26, 1954)

NCNA Peking, September 7, 1954

Mr. Premier, and Members of the Government Administration Council:

The draft of the Regulations Governing Labor Service for Reform of the People's Republic of China had been started quite some time ago. During the process of its preparation, assistance was received from Soviet legal experts, and many discussions were held and revisions made. The first draft thus arrived at was presented to the 22nd meeting of the Committee of Political and Legal Affairs of the Government Administration Council for examination and was passed after revision. To enable the work of the reform of criminals through labor service to be more properly done, more correctly handled, and to produce greater results, we consider there is the need for the early promulgation of these Regulations. We therefore submit this draft to the meeting of the Government Administration Council for examination and approval, so that they may be promulgated for enforcement. I propose now to explain certain points connected with the chief contents of the present draft Regulations:

I.

During the past few years, the organs for enforcing labor service for reform of different levels throughout the country, under the leadership of the people's governments of different levels, abiding by the directive on the matter in Chairman Mao's treatise On People's Democratic Dictatorship and Article 7 of the Common Program, and on the basis of the basic policy of the Chinese Communist Party and the Central People's Government for the reform of criminals through labor into new people, have thorougly implemented the correct program of "coordinating punishment and control with ideological reform", and "coordinating labor production with political education". As a result, in the work of the reform of criminals through labor, there have been registered great achievements.

Our organs enforcing labor service for reform have not limited their task to the confinement of large numbers of criminals so that they may not continue to perpetrate evil acts in society, but more important still, they have during the period of the punishment and custody of the criminals organized them for labor production, and during the process of such labor service carried their ideological reform, at the same time giving them cultural education and training in production skill, actively striving to transform them into new people. This has not only produced great effects on the safeguarding of the stability of public order and the smooth progress of national construction enterprises, but also enabled the absolute majority of the criminals to rapidly bow their heads in the admission of their crimes, and during the period of custody, reform to varying extents their ideology, raise their cultural attainments, and foster the habit for labor. Accordingly, quite a number of criminals, after reform through labor service, have been transformed into skilled workers in industry, agriculture, and construction engineering, and some of them after release and employment, have been elected advanced workers and labor models.

The facts have proved that the policy of reform through labor is capable of turning these criminals, during the process of labor service, into reformed persons. It is thus one of the effective means for the basic elimination of counter revolutionaries and other criminals. It is not difficult to imagine that if we have not adopted such a policy, have not ideologically transformed these people, have not enabled them to cultivate the habit for labor and acquire production skill, we shall have no means to ensure that these people on their release after the expiry of their terms, will not continue to commit crimes, to continue counter revolutionary sabotage activities that endanger the state and the people. We shall have no means to enable them to seek proper outlets in the new society and live on their own labor. Thus the policy of reforming criminals through labor is not only supported by the people throughout the country, but many criminals themselves and their families have also expressed genuine gratitude to us for the policy of reform through labor. They refer to our organs enforcing labor service for reform as "hospitals for ideological reform, schools for technical training." Some have said, "The prisons of old society put good people under custody, the prisons of the new society take into custody bad people, and turn them into new people." Others have said, "I could not control my children properly, but the Government has controlled them properly for me." Many foreign friends from the capitalist countries, after visiting our organs enforcing labor service for reform, have expressed surprise, and all agreed that "this is the most correct and most humane policy in treating criminals."

Another aspect of the achievements in the work of the reform of criminals through labor has been our organization of the criminals to carry out production on a considerably large scale. During the past four years, we have established many farms for labor service for reform, and among them are many larger farms with more than 10,000 mow of land each. We have also established considerable numbers of industrial production units, and many engineering corps for the repair of conservancy works, building of railways, felling of timber, and construction of buildings for the state. These production enterprises have not only directly benefitted the development of the state's various construction enterprises, but also prodiced a considerable saving in the expenditure of the state, and created wealth to a definite amount.

The income from production of labor service for reform of various kinds during the past four years, after deducting the living costs of the criminals and the other necessary expenses incurred in the work of reform through labor, has been accumulated, in the forms of fixed capital and fluid capital, to an amount approximately equal to the expenses appropriated by the state for reform through labor. By 1955, the aggregate income and expenditure in the country as a whole may approach balance. Many products from industrial production in labor service for reform have produced definite effects in supplying the needs of the country's capital construction and the people's livelihood. As an example, the construction materials production undertakings (of labor service for reform) last year turned out more than 2,000,000,000 bricks and 770,000,000 tiles directly supplied to the state's dapital construction projects. The hosiery works of the labor service for reform in Peking last year turned out to the people by the state. The Tientsin Steel Works last year produced more than 1,700,000 couplers for steam radiators. Because the quality came up to standard specifications, a long term contract had been entered for their supply to Anshan Steel. Indeed, existing farms, factoris, mines and kilns have already laid down the good foundations for the production enterprises of labor service for reform.

Naturally, our work of the reform of criminals through labor is not without defects, which not only existed in the past, but still remain at the present. But viewed generally, our policy for the reform of criminals through labor into new men, and the work carried out in the past four years, have achieved marked results.

On the basis of the above facts, there must be close coordination between the punishment and control of criminals, their compulsory labor for production, and the enforcement of political and ideological education, and not one of the three things must be neglected. This policy is the basis on which we have drafted these Regulations. In other words, the draft of the Regulations Governing Labor Service for Reform of the People's Republic of China is principally the summary of the experiences in our implementation of the policy during these past years. Accordingly the actual experiences of the past years have been systematized in these Regulations and they have been affirmed in legal form.

II

With reference to the provision of organs enforcing labor service for reform, on the basis of experiences of these past years, we are putting up separately detention houses, prisons, labor service for reform corps, and juvenile delinquents institutes in accordance with the nature of the crimes committed, the seriousness of the sentences, and the different conditions relating to convicted criminals and those awaiting judgment, so that different classes of criminals may be given different kinds of custody and control, to facilitate the smooth progress of trial and reform.

Counter revolutionary and other criminals suited for labor service in the open are to be turned over to the custody of labor service for reform corps, and organized in a concentrated manner for labor in the open, in planned agricultural, industrial and other production, or participation in water conservancy, road building and other engineering projects. This is the principal and comparatively more suitable organization form for the organization of criminals for labor service.

Important counter revolutionay criminals and other criminals guilty of serious crimes, not suited for labor in the open, are to be turned over to prisons to be organized for labor service within the prisons.

There are also the juvenile delinquents, though not numerous, who cannot be placed under custody together with the criminals who have attained their majority, and they must be rigidly distinguished. For in tracing responsibility for crime, the juvenile delinquents must be treated differently from the adults, andeducation and care shall occupy primary attention, so that they may be properly educated and cared for. At the same time, juvenile delinquents are more easily reformed into good people through educational methods, and besides, the physical capacity of the juvenile delinquents render them unsuitable for arduous physical labor. There is therefore the need for the provision of juvenile delinquents institutes in provinces and municipalities especially for their education. In the work of the control and education of the juvenile delinquents be paid to their ideological education and basic cultural and technical education, supplemented by light physical exertion to turn them into useful talent for the state.

A detention house is provided for the custody of criminals awaiting judgment and undergoing investigations and trial, and is principally intended for the detention of criminals awaiting judgement. There is a definite difference between it and a prison or social service for reform corps but in nature it is still a part of the tool of the people's democratic dictatorship and still an important detention and control organ for dealing with counter revolutionary and other criminals. At the same time, criminals awaiting judgment, capable of participating in labor service, shall also be made to do so. In addition, under present conditions, some detention houses have to take into custody and to reform some criminals sentenced to not more than two years. For these reasons, we have included the detention house in the organs enforcing labor service for reform, and this is fully in keeping with the spirit of the people's democratic judicial system. The Reform through Labor legislation of the Soviet Union also has the same provisions.

The above mentioned organs enforcing labor service for reform, their tasks and the scope of their work, are concretely provided for in Chapter Two of the draft Regulations.

III

Since the punishment and reform of criminals is carried out compulsorily, there is the necessity to exercise revolutionary vigilance to a high degree in the rigid control of the criminals. Accordingly, in Chapter Five of the Regulations, concrete provisions are made for taking the criminals into custody, the system of receiving callers and carrying out correspondence, and security measures under different conditions. On the other hand, on the basis of the spirit of reforming the criminals into new men, care is provided for the health of the criminals, and the material and cultural needs of living. Chapters Two to Five of the draft Regulations made appropriately concrete provisions for such matters as the labor hours, rest hours, medical services and health and sanitation facilities, food and cultural amenities, as well as the living habits of national minorities among the criminals and certain possible special difficulties met by women criminals. In addition, for the strengthening of the effects of the reform of the criminals, provision is made in Chapter Seven for the award and punishment of criminals.

IV

Finally, there is one more problem which calls for explanation. Due to the fact that in the past few years, when criminals were released on the expiry of their sentences and gone through labor service for reform, increasing numbers of them had voluntarily requested to remain in the corps for participation in production or requested the organs enforcing labor service for reform to recommend them to jobs, Article 62 of the draft Regulations has specially provided that "when a criminal is released on the expiry of his sentence, and voluntarily desires to remain in the Corps for employment, or has no home or vocation to return to, or can be found a place locally in a large and sparsely populated district, the organ enforcing labor service for reform shall undertake the organization of such people for employment."

The inclusion of this Article means that with the enforcement, not only will certain criminals be relieved of anxiety for employment on the expiry of their sentence, but the state will also have its difficulties reduced in dealing with the unemployment problem. At the same time, the criminal will be prevented from returning to crime because of his inability to seek a living. This measure not only satisfies the demand of those completing their sentences for staying with the Corps, but is also completely in accord with the interests of the state and the people.

In point of fact, during the past few years, some of the organs enforcing labor service for reform have been carrying out such measures. The Ching Ho Farm in Peking during the past four years have released 5,384 criminals on the expiry of their sentences and after performing labor service for reform, and 1,455 of them voluntarily elected to remain at the Farm, being 27 percent of all those released. These people who remained behind have all been made to participate in work on the Farm or in its subsidiary factories. Those who during the period of reform have been trained as technical workers such as tractor drivers, automobile drivers, and skilled workers in agriculture, water conservancy, medical service, electrical works, carpentry, and tile making, when retained in service, are being treated on the same basis as technicians employed. At the same time, to encourage those who ramained behind to build their homes, the family members who have been brought to the Farm have been assisted and organized for such work as straw weaving, poultry and livestock keeping, and nursery and education, so that they may gradually live on their own efforts. Accordinly, all those who remained on the Farm and their families are most grateful to the People's Government, and consider that they have "their life problems solved". Many of the criminals still under custody have been greatly moved, and expressed their desire "to work hard before the expiry of their sentences, and to strive to remain on the Farm after their expiry".

The experience of Ching Ho Farm and other units of organs enforcing labor service for reform have proved that Article 62 of the draft Regulations is completely necessary. For the concrete and thorough implementation of the provisions of Article 62, we have also drafted the "Provisional Measures for Dealing with the Release of Criminals Undergoing Labor Service for Reform, on the expiry of their Sentences, and for Placing Them in Employment". The examination and approval of these Measures are being requested at the same time.

Implement Thoroughly the Policy of the Reform of Criminals Through Labor Service

- Jen Min Jih Pao editorial -

(Peking Jen Min Jih Pao, September 7, 1954)

In our country, all criminals, including counter revolutionary criminals and other criminals, must be punished in accordance with the law of the state, if the gains of our people's democratic revolution are to be consolidated, the life and property of the state and the people are to be protected, and the smooth progress of the state's Socialist construction enterprises is to be safeguarded. But all crimes have definite social ideological roots. The evil ideology and evil habits left behind by the old society, calling for the injuring of others for self profit, and seeking enjoyment without labor, still remain in the minds of some people to a marked degree. Thus if we are to wipe out all crimes from their root, in addition to inflicting on the criminals the punishments due, we must also carry out various effective measures to transform the various evil ideological conceptions in the minds of the people, so that they may be educated and reformed into new people. The enforcement of compulsory labor service for reform among the criminals during the period of their confinement is one of the most effective means to achieve such an end.

Comrade Mao Tse-tung, in his treatise On People's Democratic Dictatorship, already pointed out to us, "As for those belonging to reactionary classes or groups, after their political power has been overthrown, we will also give them land and work, permitting them to make a living and to reform themselves through labor into persons - but only on condition that they do not rebel, sabotage, or create disturbances. If they do not want to work, the people's state will force them to do so." Article 7 of the Common Program of the Chinese People's Political Consultative Conference also provides, "Reactionary elements, feudal landlords, bureaucratic capitalists in general, must, according to law, also be deprived of their political rights within a necessary period after they have been disarmed and their special power abolished, but they shall at the same time be given a means of living and compelled to reform themselves through labor to become new men."

During the past few years, our state has carried out with great fanfare and on a nation-wide scope the movement for the suppression of counter revolutionaries, and arrested according to law large number of bandits, despots, special service agents, backbone elements of reactionary parties and corps, and leaders of reactionary societies and Taoist organizations. At the same time restraint has been placed according to law on various criminals who undermined social security, endangered the safety of the state and the people.

Of the large number of these counter revolutionary criminals and other criminals, the minority guilty of arch crimes and persisted in their refusal to repent had to be given the death penalty in accordance with the law of the state and to appease the hatred from them of the people. But as for the majority of the other criminals, our state organs have generally carried out the above mentioned directive of Comrade Mao Tse-tung and Article of the Common Program, and sentenced them to prison terms, deprived them of political rights, and carried out their reform through forced labor, organizing them for labor production, and during the process of labor, carried out among them political and ideological education. This will enable them to gradually recognize their crimes, transform their crimes, transform their reactionary standpoint of being hostile to the people (a standpoint they had brought with them from the reactionary ruling class) and other evil ideological trends, and in the midst of labor turn them into new people. Thus when they have completed their prison terms and are released from prison, they will no longer engage in criminals activities endangering the state and the people. At the same time, because during their period of reform they have learned some definite technique in production, and cultivated the habit for labor service, they will be in the position to obtain a proper living in society by relying on their own labor, and become citizens living on their own efforts.

During the past few years, we have achieved great results in the work of the reform of criminals through labor. According to statistical returns from different areas, of the criminals in confinement throughout the country, more than 83 percent have participated in agricultural and industrial production, or have been organized into various engineering corps for the felling of timber, construction of buildings, restoration and construction of conservancy works and the building of railways and highways. These criminals who have participated in labor production, under the correct leadership of Party organs and people's governments in different areas, under the control and supervision of organs enforcing labor service for reform, have achieved reform to varying extents. The absolute majority of them have actively taken the initiative to participate in labor production, to strive for the contribution of meritorious service in remission of their sins. This has gradually transformed compulsory labor into voluntary labor, and many criminals have become skilled workers in industrial and agricultural production. Among the criminals who have been released, with the exception of a number of determined counter revolutionaries and criminals deep rooted in their evil habits who continued to indulge in malpractices, the rest have generally abided by the law and actively engaged themselves in proper labor production. For this reason, the policy of the reform of criminals through labor and the concrete tasks carried out in its connection have received the enthusiastic welcome of the broad masses of the people, and many criminals and their families have also expressed their gratitude. After they were released to participate in production and other jobs, they have written to the organs enforcing labor service for reform, thanking the state for changing them into new people. Many friends from foreign countries after visiting our organs enforcing labor service for reform, have also considered it to be "the most correct and most humane policy in treating criminals."

The Government Administration Council of the Central People's Government has now promulgated the "Regulation Governing Labor Service for Reform of the People's Republic of China". These Regulations, based on the experiences in the work of reform through labor during the past few years, have affirmed in legal form our state's policy and measures in the enforcement of compulsory labor service for the reform of counter revolutionary criminals and other criminals. The organic forms of the organs enforcing labor service for reform, the scope of their authority, and the principles underlying the control of criminals undergoing reform through labor. Party committees and people's governments at all levels must educate the cadres and the masses to fully realize the important political significance of the promulgation of these Regulations, lead and supervise the organs enforcing labor service for reform in the serious implementation of the various provisions of the Regulations. In this way, the work of the reform of criminals through labor will be further improved, the counter revolutionary criminals and other criminals will continue to be educated into new people, and the people's democratic dictatorship will be further consolidated.

To ensure the correct and thorough implementation of these Regulations, the cadres and the masses must be made to realize that there is a difference in principle and nature between the organization of criminals under custody for participation in labor production and the participation in production construction on the part of the general masses of the people. In our state, the people are the masters, they enjoy full democratic rights. Their participation in the production construction of the state is motivated by their love for labor and for the country, and such labor is self-conscious and voluntary, and compensatory. But criminals generally, whether involved in counter revolutionary or other crimes, because of their injury to varying extents of the state and the people, have been placed under restraint by the law of the state, and deprived of their political rights. The state would organize them during their period of confinement to participation in labor production for the purpose of their education and reform, and to give them an opportunity to contribute meritorious service in remission of their sins. Such labor is forced, and without compensation, and carried out under strict control. The organs carrying out this task are thus not ordinary production units, but one of the tools of the people's democratic dictatorship, organs for the punishment and reform of all counter revolutionary and other criminals.

For this reason, in dealing with the reform of criminals through labor, we must implement the policy of "coordinating punishment and control with ideological reform, coordinating labor production with political education". That is to say, in dealing with criminals still in custody, while their living must be appropriately cared for and their maltreatment cannot be tolerated, they must also be remembered as criminals who had once endangered the state and the people, and they may still entertain a hostile attitude toward the state and the people. Thus their control and supervision must be strengthened, and they must be made to engage, under rigid control, in labor production, and during this process accept definite political education and ideological education, to reform themselves ideologically, and to acquire the necessary cultural knowledge and production skill. Only with the close coordination of punishment and control, compulsory labor production, and the enforcement of political and ideological education, may the work of reform through labor be smoothly developed, and the expected results realized.

On the other hand, if we attach importance only to labor production, and relax the necessary punishment, we shall assuredly give certain criminals who resist reform the opportunity to continue their secret sabotage of labor production, or even to engage in greater sabotage activities, so that the task of reform through labor cannot be carried out in an orderly manner. Naturally, at the same time we also should not relax the leadership and organization of the criminals to make a good job of labor production, as otherwise we shall similarly fail in our objective of reforming the criminals through labor. Accordingly, mistaken are both the conceptions of neglecting political control and education, and of neglecting reform through labor.

The compulsory labor service for reform applied to criminals in custody is an effective means for the basic elimination of the criminal acts of the counter revolutionary and other criminals. The correct and thorough implementation of this policy, and the persistent continuation of its application will succeed in the education and reform of those criminals who did no good to the state and the people but instead did much harm, into people who not only will cease to harm the state and the people, but also prove useful to them. This policy is obviously very necessary for the consolidation of our social order, for the strengthening of the people's democratic dictatorship, and for the promotion of the smooth development of national construction enterprises. Organs of states at all levels must educate cadres and the masses to fully appreciate the political and economic significance of this task, and thus to attend to the job with a correct attitude, and within possible scopes give assistance to the organs enforcing labor service for reform, helping them to make even a better job of their task.

Party committees and people's governments at all levels must give constant attention to this work, strngthen its leadership and supervision, and make labor service for reform serve the needs of national construction, including it in the local production plans. The production and management affairs of units for labor service for reform, in addition to accepting the direct leadership of the relevant public security organs, shall also accept the unified leadership of the local committees of financial and economic committees, and in their various concrete undertakings, accept the guidance of different competent financial and economic departments, so as to strengthen the planning aspect of production, and further raise the production and management levels. Production by criminals undergoing reform through labor may thus be smoothly developed, to make even greater contributions to the development of the state's economic construction enterprises.

NEW DATA ON CHINA FORCED LABOR

PRESENTED BY THE INTERNATIONAL CONFEDERATION OF FREE TRADE UNIONS

TO THE NINTH SESSION OF THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY, UNITED NATIONS

The Report of the Ad Hoc Committee on Forced Labor mentions that it was not possible to complete its study of the allegations relating to China because documentary material pertaining thereto (particularly the laws and regulations) had not been cited nor submitted and could not be obtained by the Committee. Nevertheless, the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions continued its investigation and is in a position to submit to the Economic and Social Council such official documentation on forced labor in the China Mainland which the Ad Hoc Committee was not able to obtain. It consists of:

1: Regulations Governing Labor Service for Reform of the Peoples' Republic of China (NCNA New China News Agency Peking Sept. 7, 1954)

2: Explanation of the Draft of Regulations Governing Labor Service for Reform (by Lo Jui-Ching and NCNA, Peking Sept. 7, 1954)

3: Provisional Measures for Dealing with Release of Criminals Undergoing Labor Service for Reform on the Expiry of their Sentences, and for Placing them in Employment.

Now we have before us the Government Administration Council of the Peking Central Peoples' Government decision of August 26, 1954, and representing the Regulations Governing Labor Service for Reform of the Peoples' Republic of China. These Regulations, together with the subsidiary Provisional Measures, provide for the employment of former criminals who have completed their prison terms. What was up to now only rumors from scattered sources is at this moment officially admitted. It is based on a directive of Chairman Mao Tse-Tung, "On Peoples' Democratic Dictatorship", as well as the provisions of Article 7 of the Common Program.

Mao explained that reactionaries, on the overthrow of their government, "will be allowed to continue to live and to reform themselves through labor.

If they do not want to work, the people's state will force them to do so."

Article 7 of the Common Program clearly declares that "feudal landlords, bureaucratic capitalists and reactionary elements in general .... shall be given some means of livelihood through labor ao as to become new men". (The Common Program, page 4)

Only general provisions are given regarding living conditions of convicts undergoing reform through labor. They are to work for from 9 to 10 hours daily, and not over 12 hours at most during seasonal busy periods.

Most significant are the provisions relating to the release of prisoners on completion of their terms. Normally they are to be released on expiry of their sentences or on parole. In the case of people who voluntarily elect to remain with the Labor Service Corps, or who have no home to return to, steps are to be taken to get them employment.

Prisoners with a bad record while in custody, consequently not successfully "reformed" during their confinement hence likely to continue their criminal activities upon release after serving their terms, may, on the recommendation of the authorities of the Labor Service Corps, be brought before a court and there sentenced to a continued term of labor service for reform.

The first chapter of the "Regulation", in its second article stipulates the political character of the Forced Labor System when it says:

> "The machineries for labor service for reform of the People's Republic of China constitute a tool of the people's democratic dictatorship (!) being machineries for the punishment and reform of all counter-revolutionary criminals and other criminals".

The purpose of this detainment is explained in Article 4 where it is said:

> "Organs enforcing labor service for reform, in dealing with all counter-revolutionary criminals and other criminals shall thorougly carry out the policy of coordinating labor production and political education".

The emphasis in the entire document on Regulations is on those "criminals" who have to be "reformed", which makes it clear that the purpose is not only the need for workers on certain government enterprises but the suppression of every kind of opposition to the Communist regime. Article 26 clearly spells it out. It states:

> "In dealing with the criminals there shall be regularly adopted the measures of collective study classes, individual interviews, study of assigned documents and organized discussions to educate them in the admission of guilt and obedience to law, political and current events, labor production and culture so as to expose the nature of the crime committed, thoroughly wipe out criminal thoughts and establish a new moral code".

How does the People's Government think to enforce the security measures? Article 47 informs us of the ideas of the Chinese Mainland rulers in this direction. It says, in so many words, that where preventive measures have been exhausted, an organ enforcing labor service reform and its security forces may resort to the use of arms.

The 10 or 12 hour work day does not seem strenuous enough for the internee. Therefore the Regulations decree that the criminals shall have one rest day each half month and juvenile delinquents shall have one rest day a week.

Lo Jui-ching, the Vice-chairman of the Committee of Political and Legal Affairs GAC, and Minister of Public Security, commenting on the Draft of Regulations Governing Labor Service for Reform, also tells us who was emulated in these regulations. On the 7th of September, 1954, speaking of the preparation of the document for the Regulations, he says that assistance was received from Soviet legal experts.

In the same document, explaining the treatment of prisoners, Lo Jui-ching said of the detention houses, that in the establishment of these Houses the Chinese Government was fully in keeping with the spirit of the People's Democratic Judicial System. "The reform through Labor Legislation of the Soviet Union also has the same provisions".

These admissions show that the Soviet Union has been taken as an example for dealing with political opponents, all of whom are classified under the same title, "counter-revolutionaries".

The documents show many more statements indicating that the Chinese Communists are copying exactly the system on Forced Labor in the Soviet Union. Mr. Lo Jui-ching relates his experience which carried the ideological reform to the point that they enabled "the absolute majority of the criminals to rapidly bow their heads in the admission of their aims and during the period of custody, reform to varying extents, their ideology".

We also learn important data on the economic results of Forced Labor in China. The "Explanation" mentions the following figures:

> "Many products from industrial production in labor service for reform have produced definite effects in supplying the needs of the country's capital construction and the people's livlihood. As an example, the construction materials production undertakings (of labor service for reform) last year turned out more than 2,000,000,000 bricks and 770,000,000 tiles directly supplied to the State's capital construction projects. The hosiery works of the labor service for reform in Peking last year turned out 714,000 dozen of socks which also directly assisted the supply of daily necessities. The Tientsin Steel Works last year produced more than 1,700,000 couplers for steam radiators".

These figures show the increasing economic importance which forced labor plays in the National economy.

Countries conquered by the USSR suddenly are found crowded by "criminal elements". Since the main crime committed in these formerly self-governing nations is the opposition to the Communist totalitarian regime, the chapter entitled "Implement Thoroughly the Policy of the Reform of Criminals Through Labor Service" as explained by Jon Min Jih Pao on September 7, 1954, states:

"During the past few years, our state has carried out with great fanfare and on a nation-wide scope the movement for the suppression of counter revolutionaries, and arrested according to law large number of bandits, despots, special service agents, backbone elements of reactionary parties and corps, and leaders of reactionary societies and Taoist organizations. At the same time restraint has been placed according to law on various criminals who undermined social security, endangered the safety of the state and the people. Of the large number of those counter-revolutionary criminals and other criminals, the minority guilty of arch crimes and persisted in their refusal to repent had to be given the death penalty in accordance with the law of the state and to appease the hatred from them of the people".

Nowhere can you find an explanation of who is a reactionary - which shows that the Soviet authorities have to use the broadest interpretation so as to include all those elements having a deep conviction which cannot be shattered even by the Camp regime's efforts at brain washing.

The following are some conclusions to be drawn from the study of Chinese Forced Labor:

Forced Labor in China does exist in various parts of the Chinese Mainland;

The conditions relating to the treatment of prisoners in China bear out the fact that they are closely related to the Soviet system of Forced Labor;

Treatment of inmates of the Camps seem to be similar, and copied from the USSR Regulations;

The majority of the prisoners appear to be "criminals" who could not be forced to accept Communist thinking and Communist practice.

The documents mentioned above are attached to this Memorandum. Their content speaks for itself. Nobody can any longer deny that Chinese "Communism" is not different from Soviet "Communism".

The material attached hereto is not the only information which the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions possess on the topic of Forced Labor. We have concentrated on the abovementioned Chinese Mainland documents whose content cannot be disputed.

This is a justification for the further need of an impartial body of experts to continue the study undertaken by the Ad Hoc Committee. In order to have this job done in a very objective way, it is recommended that a committee be appointed jointly with the ILO in order to continue the investigation and report back on its findings. The whole civilized world will welcome such conscientious work and is prepared to face facts - however cruel they may be.

FOR RELEASE AT 3 P.M. EASTERN STANDARD TIME
WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 3, 1954

The United States Advisory Commission on Information today submitted its Ninth Semiannual Report to the Congress. It is the first such report dealing with the new United States Information Agency created on August 1 under Reorganization Plan No. 8. The report was signed by Erwin D. Canham, Editor of the Christian Science Monitor, as acting chairman; Philip D. Reed, Chairman of the Board of the General Electric Co., Ben Hibbs, Editor of the Saturday Evening Post; and Justin Miller, Chairman of the Board of the National Association of Radio and Television Broadcasters.

The Advisory Commission on Information was created by Act of Congress in 1948, and its members are appointed by the President. The Commission reports twice a year to the Congress.

The report covers the five-month period from August 1, when the new Agency was created and Theodore C. Streibert appointed Director by President Eisenhower, to December 31, 1953.

Highlights of the report are summarized below. (Copies of the full report, limited in number, may be obtained at the Department of State, News Division; the Press Club; and the U. S. Information Agency, 1776 Pennsylvania Avenue, Room 408.)

"The United States Government is in the international information field out of sheer necessity," the United States Advisory Commission on Information said today in its Ninth Semiannual Report to the Congress.

"It dare not pull out of this field any more than it would dare to pull out of military defense," the Commission continued. "Russia's military might is within her own boundary but her propaganda might is on the loose in the world. We must do all in our power to thwart it, unmask its lies and pretenses and break its hold over allegiances and loyalties of men."

The Commission made 14 specific recommendations for further improving the effectiveness of the international information program. They are:

1. That the 83rd Congress take action to express congressional intent consistent with the directive which President Eisenhower gave the new U. S. Information Agency last fall.

2. That the Congress appoint a permanent joint Congressional committee for general liaison work with the Agency.

3. That the U. S. Information Agency be spared further formal investigations by congressional committees at this time.

4. That the President designate the Director of the Agency a permanent voting member of the Operations Coordinating Board, an arm of the National Security Council.

5. That the Exchange of Persons program be transferred from the Department of State to the U. S. Information Agency.

6. That steps be taken to give the Agency greater freedom in management of budget and personnel.

7. That Congress take action to give career tenure to at least one category of information agency personnel.

8. That the U. S. Information Agency's training program be implemented and a training school for its personnel established.

9. That the top information officer at important missions abroad, the Public Affairs Officer, be given the rank of Minister of Embassy.

10. That employees of the U. S. Information Agency abroad be given diplomatic status and granted diplomatic passports in the same way as when the information program was part of the Department of State.

11. That Congress authorize a building in Washington suitable to house the entire staff and facilities of the U. S. Information Agency.

12. That adequate funds be provided in the budget for the 1955 fiscal year for more translations of books and articles.

13. That provision be made to develop a plan to utilize "the powerful medium of television" in the information program.

14. That a greater effort be made to find ways of using the support of American private industry and business at home and abroad.

In reporting

In reporting on progress since August 1, 1953, the Commission said the "creation of a new Agency has resulted already in several improvements over conditions that existed a year ago," and listed eleven "important signs of the progress."

"In our judgment," said the Commission, "the new Agency is off to a good start. It has a new directive from the President; a new conception of its missions; a new form of organization, and many new men in its top positions. While it is altogether too early to judge the results of its work, yet its efforts reflect an honest and intelligent attempt to comply with the wishes of the new administration and of the 83rd Congress for a bold new type of program."

NINTH SEMIANNUAL REPORT TO THE CONGRESS

JANUARY 1954

FOREWORD

The United States Information and Educational Exchange Act of 1948 (Public Law 402) was approved by the Eightieth Congress on January 27, 1948, an act to promote the better understanding of the United States among the peoples of the world and to strengthen cooperative international relations. Reorganization Plan No. 8 of 1953 provided for the transfer of information program functions from the Department of State to an independent agency. The U. S. Information Agency came into being on August 1, 1953.

Public Law 402 created the United States Advisory Commission on Information to formulate and recommend to the Secretary of State* policies and programs for the carrying out of this act. It required the Commission to transmit to the Congress a semiannual report of all programs and activities carried on under the authority of the act, including appraisals, where feasible, as to the effectiveness of the several programs, and such recommendations as shall have been made by the Commission to the Secretary* for effectuating the purposes and objectives of the act and action taken to carry out such recommendations.

This is the ninth semiannual report by the United States Advisory Commission on Information to the Congress. The eighth report was transmitted in August 1953.

NINTH SEMIANNUAL REPORT TO THE CONGRESS

On August 1, 1953, under Reorganization Plan No. 8, a new United States Information Agency (USIA) was launched. It combines into one organization the former International Information Administration (IIA) of the Department of State (except the Exchange of Persons Program), the overseas information activities of the former Mutual Security Agency (MSA) and Technical Cooperation Administration (TCA) in accordance with a recommendation made by this Commission to the 83rd Congress in January, 1953. In accordance with Reorganization Plan No. 8 this Commission is now advisory on the book and information centers program as well as on the other media. It is the only commission that is now advisory to USIA.

This report covers our observation and appraisal of the new Agency for the five-month period August 1 to December 31, 1953. It is limited to the aspects of the work of USIA concerning which we offer comments, suggestions for improvement, and recommended actions for the second session of the 83rd Congress.

First let it be said that in our judgment the new Agency is off to a good start. It has a new Director and a new directive from the President; a new conception of its mission, a new form of organization, and many new men in its top positions. While it is altogether too early to judge the results of its work, yet its efforts reflect an honest and intelligent attempt to comply with the wishes of the new administration and of the 83rd Congress for a bold new type of program. For this effort we feel that it deserves, for the time being at least, the sympathetic support of the Executive, Legislative branches of our Government, private industry, and the general public. This report includes a number of recommended actions on the part of Congress and the Executive branch which, if taken, will we believe materially improve its chances of success. The recommendations are stated first in a condensed form and expanded in the main body of the report.

I

Recommendations

1. The new directive. The President has handed down to the Agency a directive which defines its mission as follows:

> "The purpose of the United States Information Agency shall be to submit evidence to peoples of other nations by means of communications techniques that the objectives and policies of the United States are in harmony with and will advance their legitimate aspirations for freedom, progress, and peace."

It is recommended:

THAT early in its second session the 83rd Congress shall take appropriate action to express congressional intent consistent with this directive.

2. Congressional liaison. The Director of USIA now reports to the President through an arm of the National Security Council (NSC) known as the Operations Coordinating Board (OCB) which provides an open channel of communication between the Agency and the head of the Executive branch. A single official channel should be opened for constant communication with the Legislative branch.

It is recommended:

THAT a permanent joint congressional committee composed of representatives from existing committees concerned with foreign policies and appropriations be appointed for general liaison with the work of USIA.

3. Congressional investigations. During the past year USIA-IIA has undergone two congressional investigations, one by the Senate's Foreign Relations Subcommittee on Overseas Information Programs (the Hickenlooper Committee) and one by the Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations of the Committee on Government Operations (the McCarthy Committee). It has also been investigated by the President's Committee on International Information (the W. H. Jackson Committee).

It is recommended:

THAT USIA be spared further formal investigations by congressional committees until it has had an opportunity to prove itself.

4. Closer liaison with the Executive branch. The work of all overseas operating agencies of the United States Government is now coordinated by an arm of NSC known as OCB. Although the Director of USIA attends the meetings of this board on invitation he is not a regular voting member.

It is recommended:

THAT the President designate the Director of USIA a permanent voting member of OCB.

5. The composition of USIA. All overseas information programs of the United States Government, except the Exchange of Persons Program, are now in USIA. The Exchange of Persons Program lies within the scope of the new directive and is currently serviced overseas as in the past by USIA personnel.

It is recommended:

THAT the Exchange of Persons Program be transferred from the Department of State to USIA.

6. Greater flexibility for USIA in the management of its budget and personnel. Although USIA enjoys greater freedom in its management than did IIA, yet the organization of its work in a rapidly changing international scene requires a greater flexibility than it now has.

It is recommended:

THAT steps be taken to give USIA greater freedom in the management of its budget and personnel.

7. Career tenure for USIA overseas personnel. The overseas personnel of USIA over which it has exclusive control are classified as Foreign Service Reserve (FSR) and Foreign Service Staff (FSS). These are not career categories.

It is recommended:

THAT Congress take appropriate action to give career tenure to at least one category of USIA overseas personnel.

8. Training program for USIA personnel. The Commission has reviewed with USIA what it is presently doing in terms of personnel training and finds the training program considerably limited due to the personnel and budget cuts of last August. Training is important for all personnel--domestic and overseas--but it is particularly important for those persons who are going abroad to represent the United States Government.

It is recommended:

THAT the training program which USIA has developed be implemented and a training school established for USIA personnel.

9. Higher status in United States Embassies for USIA personnel. In the field each USIA mission is an integral part of the United States Embassy or Consulate. The new program requires greater responsibility for the head of each USIA mission, namely, the PAO. In many instances these responsibilities are equal in importance to those of the political and economic members of embassies.

It is recommended:

THAT at important missions the PAO be given the rank of Minister of Embassy.

10. Diplomatic status for USIA personnel. Prior to Reorganization Plan No. 8, which separated the information program from the Department of State, diplomatic passports were issued to USIS employees holding diplomatic and consular titles and commissions as well as to other Foreign Service employees whose duties were such as to require a diplomatic passport for the effective performance of their duties.

It is recommended:

THAT overseas personnel of USIA should be granted diplomatic status and issued diplomatic passports, as formerly when the information program was a part of the Department of State.

11. A building for the Agency in Washington. During 1954 practically all of the domestic personnel of USIA will be located in Washington. They will be scattered through several buildings. A building large enough and suitable to house the entire Agency has not been made available. The new conception of the program calls for closer coordination of all the media services, policy, research staffs and administration.

It is recommended:

THAT Congress authorize in Washington a building suitable to house the entire staff and operating facilities of USIA.

12. More translations of books and articles. IBS broadcasts in several languages; motion pictures are recorded in several languages and press and publications are translated in several languages. However, the book program is lagging behind in putting printed materials into the languages of the masses of peoples of other countries.

It is recommended:

THAT adequate funds be provided in the FY 1955 budget for more translations.

13. International television. Television is becoming an important medium of communication in the international field.

It is recommended:

THAT provisions be made for the development of a plan for utilizing the new and powerful medium of Television.

14. Greater use of American industry and business. Public Law 402 specifies that this should be done. It has been done to a considerable extent in many ways. More can be done.

It is recommended:

THAT a greater effort be made to find ways of using the support of American private industry and business both at home and abroad.

II

Reasons For The Above Recommendations

1) Early in its second session the 83rd Congress should take appropriate action to express Congressional intent consistent with this directive.

Here is the full text of the directive.

"In carrying out its responsibilities in accordance with pertinent statutes and Presidential directives, the U.S. Information Agency shall be guided by the following:

"1. The purpose of the U. S. Information Agency shall be to submit evidence to peoples of other nations by means of communication techniques that the objectives and policies of the United States are in harmony with and will advance their legitimate aspirations for freedom, progress and peace.

"2. The purpose in paragraph 1 above is to be carried out primarily:

"a. By explaining and interpreting to foreign peoples the objectives and policies of the United States Government.

"b. By depicting imaginatively the correlation between U.S. policies and the legitimate aspirations of other peoples of the world.

"c. By unmasking and countering hostile attempts to distort or to frustrate the objectives and policies of the United States.

"d. By delineating those important aspects of the life and culture of the people of the United States which facilitate understanding of the policies and objectives of the Government of the United States."

The new chord which the directive strikes was first sounded by the President in his Inaugural Address in 1953. He enunciated the positive values to which this Government and the people of the United States are committed: strength for peace; recognition of the independent rights of all nations; desire to cooperate with all friendly nations for peace; all men entitled to the blessings of prosperity and peace; and "we are called upon as people to give testimony in the sight of the world to our faith and the future shall belong to the free."

When translated into an informational program the new note was sounded by Mr. Streibert in a recent address when he said: ". . . we are not out to sell the United States. We are not trying to make them copy us, emulate us, or become like us. Rather, we are seeking to identify ourselves with the legitimate aims and aspirations of the peoples of all countries. . ."

The new program is based on the belief that the ties that bind a voluntary coalition of friendly countries are their common aspirations for peace--freedom of each to solve its own problems in its own way, to perpetuate its own culture, to hold its own standards of value, and to maintain its own freedom of religion. We should strive to strengthen these bonds of unity, both by emphasizing mutual aspirations and by combatting Communist propaganda that stresses divided issues.

It will not be easy to carry out this directive. There are many obstacles to be overcome both at home and abroad. Abroad we are faced with suspicions that our efforts are entirely selfish; that we are out to exploit other peoples for our own interests. These suspicions are reinforced by Communist propaganda. At home a medley of voices speaks from high places in tones that resound around the world concerning our national objectives and interests. Some of the pronouncements are very disturbing to friendly nations whose support we need in our efforts to combat Communism. It is not easy, in fact almost impossible, to persuade peoples of other countries that these conflicting opinions and pronouncements are typical of American democracy and reflect our belief that every man has a right to express his opinions within the limits of common decency. Moreover, it is difficult to persuade peoples of other countries that some of our objectives are in harmony with their aspirations for peace and freedom--e.g., immigration and trade restrictions.

In the final analysis the justification for the existence of this Agency in the eyes of the taxpayers and Congress is its ability to combat Communist imperialism effectively. The power of that involuntary and coerced coalition of Soviet-controlled states is indeed a threat and a menace to the free world. Who is it that does not fear a devastating atomic war between Russia and the free world? It is this fear that motivates the personal sacrifices that all of us must make to secure our defenses and to weaken the capacity of our enemy to destroy us. The extent to which the work of this Agency can reduce this anxiety, the more grateful the peoples of the free world will be for its efforts. The greater the success of this Agency in reducing the threat of war by psychological means, the less we shall need to tax ourselves for military security.

The task of combating the spread of Communism need not be elaborated here. It is clearly implied in a recent report--"The Strength of the International Communist Movement"--published by a special committee on security affairs of the Senate's Committee on Foreign Relations. We are faced with a highly organized, ruthless and unprincipled propaganda machine against which our most formidable weapon is the unvarnished truth which we believe will unmask the ugly face of this monster in the sight of the peoples of the world.

As we see it, this Presidential directive assigns to the new Agency a task that will tax to the utmost its capacities to perform. But the President of the United States has a military record of having accomplished feats which many of his fellow citizens thought were impossible. He did it by virtue of the strong support of Congress, the people of the United States and the governments and individuals of our allies.

Is this then the bold new program which Congress wants? If so, Congressional endorsement would be of great encouragement and would motivate the utmost effort on the part of its administrative officials all the way down to the lowest ranks of its employees to redouble their efforts in a determined attempt to make the new program a success. If, on the other hand, it is not the new program for which Congress is looking, we believe that the Executive branch and the Director of the new Agency are entitled to know more definitely than has been known in the past the type of program which Congress is prepared to support.

2). That a permanent joint Congressional committee composed of representatives from existing committees concerned with foreign policies and appropriations be appointed for general liaison with the work of USIA.

The Commission renews its recommendation made to Congress in its Seventh Semiannual Report. The following is quoted from it:

> "IIA (now USIA) does not now deal regularly with any standing committee or subcommittee of Congress which is primarily interested in the substantive problems of overseas information. The result of this lack has been that, while propaganda grows in importance as an arm of our foreign policy, the congressional specialists operating in this area have been limited almost entirely to the budgetary field. Officers of IIA (now USIA) have been able to turn for advice and guidance only to the House and Senate Appropriations Subcommittees dealing with Department of State (now USIA) funds, and to a much lesser degree to certain subcommittees of the Foreign Relations and Foreign Affairs Committees. Not only has this overburdened the members of these two appropriations subcommittees, but also it has meant that they have been asked to give advice on matters of policy and operations rather than on their specialty of appropriations."

Obviously, ways and means must be found for establishing understanding and effective working relations between the Information Agency, Congress, and the Executive branch. The Advisory Commission on Information stands ready to play such an intermediary role, as it may, in effecting this highly desirable end. Whether on a formal or informal basis, the Commission is ready to respond to requests or to take the initiative in establishing channels of communication and for working out methods for securing such understanding and cooperation. We are thoroughly convinced that the most important first step which could be taken in this direction would be the setting up of a joint committee of Congress for the purpose.

This Commission believes that the work of the Senate's Foreign Relation Subcommittee on Overseas Information Programs has been thoroughly and extremely constructive. It has revealed the actual and potential strengths of the Information Agency as well as its weaknesses.

3) That USIA be spared further special investigations by Congressional Committees until it has had an opportunity to prove itself.

If recommendation no. 2 is adopted there will be no further need for special investigations by Congress of the work of this Agency. The proposed permanent joint committee should in conjunction with the work of the U.S. Advisory Commission on Information be entirely adequate for keeping Congress fully informed at all times on the policies, programs, projects and management of USIA.

The wide and unfavorable publicity that resulted from one of the congressional investigations gave the Agency such a bad name that professionally competent persons were reluctant to accept employment in it. This may be one reason why the Director has experienced considerable difficulty in filling the top positions.

It is recognized, of course, that Congressional investigations are often needed for the sake of security and economy; yet it should be remembered that the personnel of an agency that is constantly under attack or subject to the threat of periodic attacks necessarily become cautious, anxious, dull, prosaic, and inefficient in their work. This is particularly true of an agency that prepares messages for overseas distribution. Those who prepare these materials are perforce made cautious of how the messages will sound or appear to the investigators and completely lose sight of whether they will be effective with their intended audience. This situation is all the more vicious and destructive when each employee fears his fellow workers.

Some of the investigations which this Agency has undergone in the past year have produced unfavorable impressions abroad on the very persons to whom the program is directed. When these people hear, through our media of communication, constant reports of attacks upon the Information Agency--challenges directed at it for supposed failures, inadequacies, poor techniques, poor programming, etc. how can we expect them to have any confidence in an Agency which does not enjoy the confidence of those responsible Government officials who seem constantly to be attacking it? The capacity for disseminating catastrophic news--which has been developed to the highest degree of efficiency by American communications media--insures that adverse reports of this kind will get the widest circulation throughout the world. It is not too much to say that the desirable results sought through the activities of the Information Agency are largely offset, if not destroyed, by this constant counter-barrage which is so generously distributed to the peoples of the world.

We believe that Congress should be kept fully and frankly informed on the work of this Agency. This can be accomplished much more effectively by a permanent joint congressional committee, as recommended above, than by sporadic special investigations.

4) That the President should designate the Director of USIA a permanent voting member of OCB.

By recommending, in our Seventh Semiannual Report, that IIA be lifted out of the Department of State and placed in a new Agency of Cabinet rank, we were gibing expression to our belief that the Director of the new Agency should be in the closest possible contact with the Office of the President and should be coordinate with the heads of other divisions of the Government engaged in overseas operations. We feel that the Director of USIA should be a participant in the deliberations concerning the coordination of overseas operations, and not be in the status of being "coordinated" by others. He is a member of a team and should be given first-class citizenship on the team.

5) That the Exchange of Persons Program be transferred from the Department of State to USIA.

We make this recommendation in full realization that we are trespassing on the ground of the U. S. Advisory Commission on Educational Exchange. The fact, however, that the exchange program overseas is serviced by USIA personnel gives us a right to speak.

There were no doubt reasons for keeping this program in the Department of State when the rest of IIA was transferred into USIA. One is historical. When Public Law 402 was enacted in 1948 there were voices in State, and outside who spoke for keeping "culture" separate from "information" or "propaganda". Hence the Act was drawn to recognize this separation. From 1948 to 1952 the Washington office under the Assistant Secretary of State for Public Affairs was divided into the Office of International Information (OII) and Office of Educational Exchange (OEX). In the field, however, the two were combined. When IIA was organized in January 1952, OII and OEX were abolished and replaced with a different plan of organization. At this time the line between "culture" and "information" was less sharply drawn in Washington.

In the field, however, and from the beginning, the informational and cultural work has been well integrated. Cultural officers work closely with the officers assigned to press, motion pictures and radio. Pamphlets prepared by the press section are distributed by the information centers, motion pictures are also distributed through the information centers and large use has been made of them by Cultural officers.

As to the Exchange of Persons program, exchangees upon returning to their native country have written articles for newspapers and magazines and delivered addresses before a large variety of audiences on their experiences and impressions of the United States.

On the whole these activities have done much to promote the main purpose of the Information Agency in promoting mutual understanding between the United States and other peoples. It is clear therefore, that the Exchange of Persons program is in fact an integral part of the work of the USIA.

USIA is conceived to be basically an Agency of general education on a world wide scale. It dispenses facts and ideas to non-captive audiences. Among these are not only facts about American life and culture but ugly facts about Communism.

The question has been raised as to whether or not the Exchange of Persons program overseas should be administered by the Department of State, rather than USIA. From our point of view this would be an unnecessary duplication of effort and would involve an increased appropriation to the Department of State. However, it would not be possible to reduce the appropriations to USIA accordingly because of the other duties that are now being performed by its overseas personnel particularly its Cultural officers.

6) That steps be taken to give USIA greater flexibility and freedom in the management of its budget and personnel.

Although USIA is completely autonomous and has much more control over its budget and personnel than did IIA, yet it is by no means free from bureaucratic restrictions placed on it (a) by other agencies, such as the Civil Service Commission, and (b) by its own internal bureaucracy. Its personnel who were transferred to it from IIA and MSA brought with them their former habits of work and the rules that they had learned to live by. Like all habits and rules these particular ones lack flexibility.

Many bureaucrats suffer from an occupational disease which Veblen called "trained incapacity". It is chronic but not fatal to the person, but when too many are afflicted by it, it becomes fatal to an organization. One symptom is that the patient can think of 100 reasons why something new or unusual but really very simple and important cannot be done. These reasons are all drawn from the rules which he knows and lives by. Such rules, originally means to ends, later become ends in themselves. Other symptoms are profound sense of status, resistance to change of routine, defense of prerogatives, or an "official" attitude toward outsiders.

Members of this Commission, in their trips overseas, have seen many instances of the effects of bureaucracy on the work of USIS. We have seen exasperating instances where requests for authorization or small allocations of funds for special purposes such as programming for a particular national holiday, or for renting additional space for a particular period of time, have had to work their way up through the long channels of administrative procedure, sometimes to get lost in the pigeonholes and sometimes finally to arrive back with an equivocal answer weeks after the event has passed. We have found instances in which the transfer of personnel from one assignment to another--sometimes even at the same post--has been delayed for weeks or months in order to go through the long process of loyalty investigation, etc., even though the person has been cleared by previous investigations and is already charged with work of as great or greater secrecy than that with which he would be concerned in the new assignment. We have seen instances where in particular countries "representation" funds have been so limited--allocated on a country basis--that it has been impossible to do immediate, imperative jobs in order to achieve the objective of the operation in that particular country. We have seen instances in which--following these frozen techniques of personnel transfer--a man has been suddently jerked out of an information post and given a new tour of duty, without the slightest regard for the disastrous effect which such unheralded transfer might have on the program from which he is taken, and without provision for a new man being sent in to take his place. We have seen occasions on which new men, finally sent in after lapses of months of time, have been entirely unprepared for the task; who have found it necessary to get acquainted all over again with the language, the people, the customs, the habits, and the religions of the people.

A recent instance occurred in USIA when Mossadegh was overthrown in Iran and USIS was free to restore operations. The Director wanted to rush reinforcements to Iran immediately. But there were rules to be reckoned with--rules about transfer of foreign service personnel, rules about transferring items in the budget. It was finally done but only after some drastic violations of self-imposed rules inherited from the Department of State.

USIA can, of course, set up its own internal ground rules, within the framework of restrictions placed on it by basic laws administered by other agencies under their rules. There are some restrictions, however, that we feel Congress could and should remove. One is the controversial question of budgetary restrictions on funds for so-called "representation." This term is Department of State jargon and should be dropped from the vocabulary of USIA. The field officers of USIA need funds not for representing the United States at official dinners, cocktail parties, etc. but for winning friends and influencing people by picking up the check when a persuasive conversation has been reinforced with a good meal. There is no more reason why such operating costs should be paid out of their own pockets than for them to pay for the paper on which the Wireless File is printed. One of the costs of "public relations," as every businessman knows, is the expense of entertaining clients and customers. USIA officers in the field are our "public relations" officers. It is a major part of the business of our overseas personnel.

There are other budgetary restrictions that hamper the work of USIA. This Commission believes that the Director should have a modest discretionary fund for use in emergencies. The need for such a fund is self-explanatory and implicit in the nature and work of the Agency.

7) That Congress take appropriate action to give career tenure to at least one category of USIA overseas personnel.

Following the approval of the Reorganization Plan, the President issued an Executive Order transferring to the Director of USIA complete personnel authority over Foreign Service Reserve (FSR), Foreign Service Staff (FSS), and Foreign Service Local (FSL) employees. The major exceptions were authority to regulate allowances and differentials and authority to issue or grant diplomatic and consular titles and commissions. No authority was transferred to the Director for employment of Foreign Service Officers. The Foreign Service Act, however, permits the assignment of Foreign Service Officers (FSO's) to the program by the Department of State. The Foreign Service Officer career system is such that it is not feasible for the new Agency to employ Foreign Service Officers under the Department of State's system. Consequently, the need for career officers of this type must be met by negotiation with the Department of State for assignment of Foreign Service Officers to the program. This arrangement for assignment of Foreign Service Officers to the program has disadvantages for USIA in that the program cannot rely on these officers for extended service. After one or two tours of duty, the officer and Department normally insist on rotation to other types of foreign service work.

In the long run this lack of a career group similar to the Foreign Service Officer category will handicap the program. The foreign service personnel system, as established by the Foreign Service Act, places basic dependence on the FSO category to provide the backbone of the service.

The salary structure of the Foreign Service Act establishes two separate salary structures for staff and reserve employees, and the four-year limitation on the employment of reserve officers further handicaps the program. The only permanent employees the Agency can hire for overseas work are staff employees. Salary structure for staff employees does not permit employment at the higher salary levels. Officers employed at the higher salary level must, of necessity, be placed in the reserve category and the four-year limitation prevents their employment for extended career service.

The Commission has been informed that the President has authorized a study on overseas personnel administration which is now under way. We endorse this study, but the need is immediate as far as USIA is concerned, and in our opinion Congress should make special provisions for USIA overseas personnel.

8) That the training program which USIA has developed be implemented and a training school established for USIA personnel.

In our Sixth Report to the Congress which was dated July 1, 1952, we made specific recommendations with respect to a training program for personnel of the International Information Administration. Upon receipt of this report by the Secretary of State, he made a reply to the Commission that positive action was being taken to improve the training of the IIA personnel. This was reported in our Seventh Semiannual Report to the Congress dated February 1953.

We have reviewed with the United States Information Agency what it is presently doing in terms of personnel training and find it is considerably limited due to the personnel and budget cuts of last August. We have had an opportunity to review a training plan for USIA which would seem to be quite adequate if it were implemented, and we cannot urge too strongly the necessity for such a training program. Training is important for all personnel--domestic and overseas--but it is particularly important for those persons who are going abroad to represent the United States Government. The proposed training plan incorporates all of the points which we outlined in our Sixth Report. We feel that this is one of the most urgent problems facing the Agency and would recommend that immediate action be taken.

9) That at important missions the PAO be given the rank of Minister of Embassy.

The new Agency is resolved to give greater responsibilities to its field officers both in matters of operation and in determining specific country objectives. There is, therefore, an acceleration of a trend started three years ago when this Commission first recommended greater decentralization. Thus in each country the PAO is the most important man in the program. He is the key to our success. Working with a small staff-often pathetically under-staffed, often by himself--at remote posts--he runs the operation where the program pays off--on the front lines overseas. In many respects he functions as an ambassador.

When we are visited in this country by the King and Queen of Greece, when our Vice-President makes a good-will tour of the world, when the President's brother goes down to Argentina to iron out diplomatic differences of long standing, when the President of the United States goes to Mexico or Canada for similar purposes, we see at once the effectiveness of the "personal touch" and the importance of "people." When an American ambassador makes a tour through the country to which he is assigned so that the people of the nation have a chance to see him and hear him speak, the good-will results are tremendous, as everyone who is acquainted with our diplomatic relations is well aware. We need in every country of the world at least one Public Affairs Officer who can be available for just such good-will operations. He should be available for speaking to all manner of groups of people--business, educational, religious, governmental, labor, etc.--and his work should be so organized that he would have practically all his time available for such purposes. In order to achieve this, he should have sufficient secretarial help and an administrative officer to whom he could safely entrust the routine of the office operation. Thus he would be left free and available for breakfast, luncheon, dinner and many other kinds of meetings where he could associate with the people of the country to which he is assigned. There he could speak on all possible occasions concerning those phases of American life and policy about which we wish the people of the world to know. We cannot afford to be stingy with appropriations for such purposes. We cannot assume that the formal approaches of books, motion pictures, broadcasting, etc. can achieve the objectives which we have in mind. No one would assume that in the United States, for example, a member of Congress could possibly carry on a campaign for election or properly keep in touch with his constituents between elections by the use of such formal methods of communication. We take it for granted that the personal contact, the personal interpretation of governmental policy, and the personal explanation of governmental action is an absolute minimum requirement. How much more important it is that the same method should be used in other countries of the world which have little or no background understanding of what goes on in the United States and which are subject to the most vicious campaigns of misrepresentation and untruth.

The effectiveness of this kind of personal work depends in no small degree on the prestige status of the man. The higher he ranks in the Embassy, the more attention will be paid to what he says.

10) That overseas personnel of USIA should be granted diplomatic status and issued diplomatic passports as formerly when the information program was a part of the Department of State.

Prior to Reorganization Plan No. 8, which separated the information program from the Department of State, diplomatic passports were issued to USIS employees holding diplomatic and consular titles and commissions as well as to other Foreign Service employees whose duties were such as to require a diplomatic passport for the effective performance of their duties.

In working out the details for implementing the reorganization plan, it was agreed that when the U.S. Information Agency was established the status quo would be maintained in the field with respect to diplomatic and consular titles and commissions, and by inference with respect to diplomatic passports for persons holding such commissions. In fact, the Department of State concurred with an instruction to the field, dated July 29, 1953, which reads as follows:

"9 Diplomatic and Consular Titles and Commissions

The Director of the new Agency (USIA) will have no authority with respect to recommending to the President, or granting diplomatic or consular commissions. Diplomatic and consular titles and commissions in effect on July 31, 1953 for IIA Reserve and Staff employees will continue in effect after August 1 for employees transferred to USIA. After August 1, the Director will request the Secretary of State to recommend to the President or to grant any additional or new diplomatic and consular titles and commissions to USIA Reserve and Staff employees in individual cases as he determines that such titles and commissions are necessary to the effective performance of the Program."

Prior to August 1, the Department of State recognized foreign information activities as a normal and legitimate component of embassy and consular programs. Reorganization Plan No. 8 did not alter the status of the program in the field. There should be no question as to whether this Agency performs diplomatic and consular functions. A recently-issued National Security Council directive charges the Agency with "explaining and interpreting to foreign peoples the objectives and policies of the U. S. Government." However, since the creation of the U.S. Information Agency, the Department of State questions the validity of issuing consular titles and commissions and diplomatic passports to USIA officers in the consulates. The Department has also sharply restricted the issuance of diplomatic passports to USIA officers in the embassies. The Department will no longer issue diplomatic passports to domestic program officers making trips abroad, except for the Director himself.

Although the Department has placed in effect its new restrictive policies, the questions of granting diplomatic and consular titles and commissions and issuing diplomatic passports to USIA employees are being reviewed by it. The Commission urges that the diplomatic status of the program be preserved. This recommendation is based on the following:

1. Prior to Reorganization Plan No. 8 the information program was accorded diplomatic status by the Department of State.

2. It was not the intent of Reorganization Plan No. 8 to alter the status of the program but rather to strengthen it.

3. Basically, the information program carries out diplomatic-consular functions as it is concerned with interpreting and explaining U. S. foreign policy and objectives to foreign peoples.

4. The Department of State accords diplomatic recognition to the information programs of other governments.

5. Diplomatic status is necessary to obtain appropriate diplomatic protection for the program, its property and personnel, and the free entry of program property through customs.

6. Proper diplomatic accreditation of USIA officials is necessary to receive official recognition from their counterparts in the host Government and to enable them to conduct pertinent business effectively.

11) That Congress authorize in Washington a building adequate to house the entire staff and operating facilities of USIA.

During the past three or four years the work of the Agency has been hampered by the fact that its domestic forces have been divided between New York and Washington and by the further fact that in neither city have they been housed in one building. The Commission is in sympathy with the directive of Congress that the "Voice of America" operations be moved to Washington by June 30, 1954. Whether this deadline can be met remains to be seen.

A search has been made in Washington for an appropriate building and one has been found which, although not entirely satisfactory, will serve the needs of the Agency for the time being. However, the Agency still finds its staff spread out in three or four buildings, one of which is considerable distance from the others.

The Commission believes that the work of this Agency would be substantially improved if its entire personnel and necessary broadcasting facilities could be housed in one building.

12) That adequate funds be provided in the FY 1955 budget for more translations.

Another important phase of the information program which requires more emphasis is the translation of representative American books. There are vast numbers of people throughout the world who can be reached only through their native tongues. The extent to which the Reader's Digest is now being distributed throughout the world, in various translations, is a good example of what we need in this respect. If we expect to get useful results from our libraries or from pamphlets which we distribute, we must have translations of material which can be placed in those libraries and in the hands of such people.

The translation program has been seriously limited by the reduction in personnel both in Washington and in the field and the loss of trained staff, making it impossible to even maintain the program within the present allotment for the current fiscal year. In the fiscal year 1953 private publishers abroad were able to publish 582 translated editions in 41 languages totaling approximately 11 million copies of American books. During the first six months of fiscal year 1954 only 130 titles were reported published.

Some tentative measures are being made to alleviate the limitations in the program by sending Washington staff to the field to give direction and encouragement to the translation program and to train employees in the field to assume responsibility for this work.

Recently the policy has been adopted of translating the Wireless File into Spanish and Portuguese for transmission to the Latin American countries. We are delighted that this is being done. As a matter of fact, the Commission noted this discrepancy and made similar recommendations several years ago. This is a good illustration of how slowly this operation has been moving. From time to time we hear about the large number of copies of the Bible which are distributed throughout the world and into how many languages the Bible has been translated. From time to time we get reports on the considerable number of translations of books by outstanding American authors. These are instances in which private enterprise--either American or foreign--has done what we should be doing on a very large scale, selecting material with great care and having it well translated into lay language.

13) That provision be made for the development of a plan for utilizing the new and powerful medium of television.

The Broadcast Advisory Committee of the U.S. Advisory Commission on Information* has given considerable attention to the possible use of television programs overseas. The Committee has submitted to the Commission this information:

Semiannual surveys by the International Broadcasting Service (IBS) on the status of international television show that there are now 23 countries on the air with regular or experimental television transmissions as against 5 in 1950. It is estimated that by 1955, 42 countries will have established transmitters. In 1950 there were approximately a half million sets. Today there are over 3 million throughout Europe, Latin America, and the Far East with an audience of 30 million. The impact of television on the foreign viewers has been just as tremendous as it was in the United States during its early days.

The Soviet Union is building a high-power television transmitter in Communist East Germany from which they can service an area covering not only a large area of Eastern Germany, but also much of West Germany, parts of Switzerland, France, the Saar, Luxembourg, Belgium, and the Netherlands. Large screen community-type sets are being installed in the Soviet Union in small towns close to Moscow, Kiev and Leningrad, where television programs have been on the air regularly for approximately two years. Satellite countries are being drained of their production of television equipment, and reports have been received that the Soviet Union is beginning to place filmed material on television stations throughout Latin America and even on the BBC in London.

The Broadcast Advisory Committee feels that television will play an increasingly important role in the information program and that adequate funds must be appropriated for this medium. Television is a strongly competitive field. Curves of experience in private industry show that television has been rising steadily. It is, therefore, extremely important that IBS lay the groundwork with overseas telecasters now so that when television reaches its full stride they will be in a favorable position. The Committee strongly recommends a projected plan covering the use of television for the next three, four, or five years.

14) That a greater effort be made to find ways of using the support of American private industry and business both at home and abroad.

The Smith-Mundt Act, at several points, specifies that the information program should make as much use as possible of American industry, even to the extent of abandoning certain phases of the work of the Agency when it appears that American industry has succeeded in achieving the particular job in an adequate manner. The Commission believes that this principle, enunciated in the Smith-Mundt Act, is capable of considerable expansion beyond what has been done so far.

Thus far private industry at home and abroad has been used in the following way:

a) Through the Private Enterprise Cooperation Staff (IOC) of USIA,

b) Contracts with private industry and,

c) The Informational Media Guaranty program.

a) To date, 811 private organizations have cooperated with USIA through the Office of Private Cooperation (IOC). Numerous others have cooperated directly with the media divisions. Business firms, non-profit organizations, schools, colleges and communities, nationality and fraternity groups, and cultural associations are assisting in this work.

An excellent example of the kind of cooperation being offered is the wide distribution accorded the President's speech before the UN on Atomic Energy. In addition to the extensive coverage by USIA media, 250,000 copies of a one-page digest in ten languages were distributed as mail inserts by more than 250 private organizations. Translations or summaries of the text were printed by 350 foreign-language newspapers in the U.S. with a notice urging readers to send the clipping to friends, relatives, and business associates abroad. The Atomic Industrial Forum, Inc. invited 85 foreign correspondents to a press conference in order to explain what American organizations are doing to develop atomic energy for peaceful purposes. A short USIA film on the speech is being shown overseas by Universal Pictures.

During the past three months, four other USIA films have been accepted by major motion picture companies for distribution in their theatrical circuits around the world. Another project receiving current emphasis is the encouraging of more institutional advertising by American firms abroad to help portray the advantages of American free enterprise and U.S. foreign policy objectives.

Many business firms and civic groups conduct regular collections of used American magazines for shipment overseas. Large numbers of newsstand returns are being forwarded to USIS posts. The exchange of letters is being encouraged between groups and individuals in many countries. A booklet to assist American tourists in becoming better "unofficial ambassadors" is receiving wide distribution through shipping lines, airlines, and travel agencies. An increasing number of firms are cooperating in the presentation of translations of American books to selected individuals and institutions. Medical and scientific organizations are informing their international colleagues of the facilities available to them in USIS libraries.

In order to enlist such extensive cooperation in these and a variety of other projects, IOC has distributed a number of inexpensive brochures outlining briefly and specifically the ways in which groups and individuals can help. Further plans center on encouraging national and local associations both here and abroad to devise and carry out activities completely independent of USIA materials or distribution sources. In this way it is hoped that even with a comparatively small USIA staff and budget, private cooperation can become increasingly productive and effective.

The Commission recommends that sufficient funds and staff be provided to explore and utilize all possible means of encouraging additional private organizations to further the aims and purposes for which USIA exists.

b) There is a high degree of professional proficiency in the United States and upon the part of American businessmen in other parts of the world, in this whole information area, in the production of material--motion pictures, newspapers, magazines, broadcasting scripts, sales programs, and material used for advertising.

The amount allocated for this purpose could be considerably expanded and well used to avoid the large-scale staffing of personnel at low salaries under strict Government regulations where the product of their work may be foredoomed to inadequacy.

USIA has contracts for the implementation of numerous activities which private organizations are equipped to handle more economically and as well as the Government. Examples of some of the contracts for USIA are: contracts for the use and operation of radio facilities; contracts for construction of Government-owned radio facilities; contracts for engineering research; contracts for production and transmission of radio programs to Latin America in Spanish; contracts for the original production of all motion pictures; contracts for the recording of foreign language versions and the printing of multiple copies of films; contracts with non-government research organizations for evaluation studies and appraisals; contracts for the printing of pamphlets for distribution in Latin America; contracts for the preparation of English language text books; contracts for the assembly of exhibits; contracts for the condensation and adaptation, review, production, purchase and distribution of books; and contracts for securing book translations and dramatic productions rights.

In general we believe that Government payment for information service done on contract should be made to private industry when the service can be as well or better done and at a reasonable price. Such payment to all contractors does not constitute a subsidy--but a payment for value received.

Support to private industry. Many private industries, particularly press, publications and motion pictures are engaged in extensive distribution of books, magazines, newspapers, and films overseas. Even though some of them receive Government assistance on a limited scale, the Government does not and should not censor the content of these products.

Overseas production by private broadcasting companies presents a peculiar problem to USIA. This problem stems primarily from the fact that overseas distribution of news and other programs of private broadcasting has not thus far been profitable enough to result in a large international broadcasting business comparable to the overseas business of the motion pictures, press and publications industries.

It may be that it is in the best interest of the U. S. Government to support the development of overseas broadcasting by private industry just as it is deemed in the public interest to support foreign and domestic aviation, the merchant marine, and other industries. In such an event, however, it would not be proper for the Government to exercise any supervision or censorship of its programs.

If the Congress believes that support to private industry for overseas broadcasting is in the public interest, this Commission recommends that such support be made independent of the USIA appropriations.

c) The Informational Media Guaranty Program, administered up through July 1952 by the Mutual Security Agency, has enabled USIA to increase the flow of American books and periodicals abroad by overcoming the barrier caused by dollar shortages in certain countries and making it possible for American publishers to be paid in U. S. dollars for blocked local currencies received from sales abroad. Through the contracts under the IMG program American books and periodicals are now flowing to the book sellers of the following countries: Austria, France, Germany, Italy, the Netherlands, Norway, Yugoslavia, Israel, the Philippines, and Formosa. Since October 1948 local currencies equal to over $11 million were converted into dollars under the program. As of November 30, contracts guaranteeing the future conversion of local currencies equal to almost $6 million were made with over 100 U. S. publishers, etc.

The IMG program operates on the basis of an agreement between the United States and a foreign Government. Applications for contracts by American publishers or producers must be approved by both Governments, thereby insuring that informational materials exported will be consistent with United States' interests as well as acceptable to the foreign Government. Conversion of local currency receipts to U. S. dollars is accomplished on application by publishers or producers to the United States Information Agency. All types of books, periodicals, films, translations and foreign publication rights may be sold abroad under the program provided they meet the criteria of eligibility established by the Agency.

The sale of representative American information materials through regular commercial channels abroad is a valuable adjunct to the regular program activities of the U.S. Information Agency, especially in countries where U. S. dollar exchange restrictions limit the importation and distribution of United States' books, periodicals and films. This is illustrated dramatically in the case of Israel. Previous to the initiation of the IMG program (Fall 1952) virtually no U. S. books or periodicals were available in the book stores or on the newsstands. Reading material of Russian origin was on sale throughout the country. Recent reports from Israel state that Communist publications have been forced out of the market since many book shops are as well stocked with American books as the average book store in America.

III - PROGRESS SINCE AUGUST 1, 1953

Progress to Date:

The creation of a new Agency has resulted already in several improvements over conditions that existed a year ago.

First, the Director reports directly to the President who is giving the new Agency firm support.

Second, through participation in the Operations Coordinating Board, the Agency is informed well in advance of important policy pronouncements and actions, thereby enabling it to prepare for full exploitation. Its work is coordinated better, on the whole, with that of other Government agencies.

Third, policy guidance both from the Department of State and from other departments and agencies flows more freely and at higher levels. One of the arguments against taking IIA out of the Department of State was the fear that it would be cut off from policy guidance by State. We are pleased to be advised that the contrary is true and that arrangements with the Department of State are working even more effectively than before.

Fourth, the Director reports to us that the authority given the Agency to dismiss incompetent personnel in certain categories has resulted in greater overall efficiency of work.

Fifth, the Agency has set up its own board for personnel promotions and problems concerning transfers.

Sixth, the Agency has 15 super-grade positions which have been allocated by the Civil Service Commission and assigned to top staff appointees.

Seventh, the Agency has established its own Security Office.

Eighth, much greater decentralization has taken place. The appointment of four Assistant Directors for the four regions has thus far proved to be a wise move.

Ninth, the budget for FY 1955 is set up on a regional basis for the first time. This will permit concentration of efforts in places where the need is greatest.

Tenth, the media are reorganized as service departments which "fill orders" from the field.

Eleventh, the Evaluation Staff is centralized in accordance with a recommendation in the Commission's Seventh Semiannual Report.

These are all important signs of progress.

IV - IMPORTANCE OF THIS WORK

In previous reports we have stressed the importance of the work of an international information service. We conclude this report with a re-emphasis of its importance.

This Commission believes that the dollar value of this Agency to the American taxpayer should be estimated from the point of view of its necessity as an arm of national security. Although its effectiveness may leave much to be desired, yet we cannot do without it in the face of the menace to peace and freedom created by Communist imperialism. For example, some members of Congress have asked why do we have USIS missions in friendly countries. The answer is for the same reason that we are giving economic and military aid to friendly countries--namely, to help them hold their defenses against Communism. Why are we spending $40-50 billions annually for military defense? To stop the spread of Communist imperialism by force. Why are we spending 1/12 of one billion for USIA? To stop the spread of revolutions in free countries. The United States Government is in the international information field out of sheer necessity. It dare not pull out of this field any more than it would dare to pull out of military defense. Russia's military might is within her own boundary but her propaganda might is on the loose in the world. We must do all in our power to thwart it, unmask its lies and pretenses and break its hold over allegiances and loyalties of men.

In recent months the hope of negotiating an agreement with Russia that would lessen tensions and reduce the risk of war has been revived. It is still clear, however, that no one can negotiate successfully with the Russians except from a position of strength. It is clear that military strength is not enough. There is another strength which will pressure the Russians to be less truculent and more amenable to frank and fair discussions of basic issues. It is the moral strength of a united free world. The unity which provides this strength requires more than a mutual understanding between the peoples of the free world. It requires further the firm belief that the peoples of the free world fervently desire to be guaranteed freedom from fears and suspicions of each other. These are ties that bind free nations into a voluntary coalition. The major tasks of USIA are to promote the unity of the free world and to combat the efforts of the communists to divide the world into conflicting factions.

APPENDIX

Below are the recommendations made by the Commission in its Seventh Semiannual Report to the Congress and a brief statement of the action taken on each one.

1. That the International Information Administration (IIA) be separated from the Department of State and placed in a new Agency of Cabinet level in which there is vested authority to formulate psychological strategy and to coordinate information policies of all Government agencies and consolidate all overseas information programs.

Reorganization Plan No. 8 separated the IIA from the Department of State and created a new Agency, known as the United States Information Agency, responsible for planning, programming and implementation of U. S. information activities abroad. The new Agency reports to the President through the National Security Council and sits in upon invitation with the Operations Coordinating Board of the Council as an adviser on matters involving information and propaganda considerations. The Agency collaborates with the Department of State and other members of the Board in the development of information policies, plans and programs designed to support national security policies and foreign policy objectives. (Elsewhere in this report the Commission recommends that the President designate the Director of USIA as a permanent voting member of OCB.)

2. That a permanent joint congressional Committee on International Information be established to provide liaison between the legislative and executive branches.

No action has been taken by the Congress on this recommendation.

(The Commission in this report recommends that a permanent joint congressional committee composed of representatives from existing committees concerned with foreign policies and appropriations be appointed for general liaison with the work of USIA.)

3. That Congress authorize IIA to release domestically, without request, information concerning its programs.

Executive Order No. 10477, issued in accordance with Reorganization Plan No. 8, transfers from the Secretary of State to the Director of USIA the authority to keep the American public informed about the international information aspects of the foreign affairs of the United States.

4. The United States must take a more vigorous offensive in its information program, to be lanuched from a platform of basic principles carefully worked out and enunciated.

The mission of the U. S. Information Agency is set forth in an NSC directive adopted by the President and NSC on October 22, 1953.

5. IIA must have better information on the effectiveness of its programs.

The Agency is constantly endeavoring to improve its evaluation procedures and progress is being made in this direction.

With the creation of the U. S. Information Agency a centralized Office of Research and Evaluation (IEV) was established and all media evaluation functions were transferred to the Office of Research and Evaluation. Three-man media research and evaluation staffs will be placed in the press, information centers, motion pictures, and broadcasting services. These staffs are part of IEV and will be responsible to the Director of IEV.

The Agency has continued the policy of contracting with non-governmental research groups. There are presently approximately 15 contractors doing research studies for USIA. A contract was established with the University of Illinois and the Agency now has a report entitled "A Program of Research and Evaluation for the International Information Administration" (now USIA). This report recommended a study be undertaken on the basic assumptions under which the information program operates. Such a study is now being conducted by a non-governmental research group. This report also called for gathering together available information on communications theory. Such a study has been started.

6. There must be more emphasis upon mutual activity in the information field between the United States and other nations. Although all formal agreements with other nations must be negotiated by the Department of State, USIA is continuing to promote cooperative projects with official and private organizations in many countries. Most USIS libraries are in constant contact with Ministries of Education and other cabinet offices and assist them in preparing exhibits and in compiling special collections of technical and educational materials. In almost all cities where budgetary restrictions have necessitated the closing of USIS libraries, the collections have been taken over by local libraries. In Germany, many of the America Houses are now locally financed and operated.

Although the NATO information program is not conducted under USIA aegis, the Commission is pleased to note that the operation of the NATO caravan, a traveling exhibit designed to explain the objectives of the organization, has now become the responsibility of the European governments. Similarly, the recently established Marshall scholarships, though in no way connected with USIA, serve as one more indication of an ever-increasing inter-governmental cooperation in the exchange of information.

7. IIA should make a continuing effort to encourage and direct private organizations and individuals to be of more assistance.

Plans for expanding the Agency's private enterprise cooperation program have been prepared, but as of this date (January, 1954) have not been implemented.

Dear Mr. Murrow:

Attached is part of a script of the world-wide English broadcast of the Voice of America in which, once a week, we quote editorial comment from the American press and radio.

Page 4

I thought you might be interested in knowing what we have used from one of your broadcasts of the past week. While we are not returning the actual recording which was broadcast in your voice, you will be able to tell what was used from the cues on page 4. If you are interested, I shall be glad to send you similar scripts whenever we broadcast from your programs.

We know of no better way to tell other peoples about the American people than to quote to them from our press and radio. We have made no effort to polish up the script -- it was dittoed from the working script and necessarily contains all the editorial corrections.

FREED: That's the news to this hour. And now, from the front page let's turn to the editorial pages -- for a roundup of what the editors of big and small newspapers have been saying this past week. As we went on the air, editorial reaction to the first days of the Berlin conference was just beginning to hit the newsstands. And, among the earliest these were ~~three which ran the gamut from resignation to the failure of the conference, through extremely cautious hope, to grim determination for the success of the meeting. From~~ From the editorial page of the New York Journal-American:

PARKS: Two things Soviet Russia has demanded at Berlin -- things which this country will never grant:

Recognition of Red China and its admittance to the United Nations, and Abandonment of the European Defense Community...

It now seems unlikely that the Berlin Conference will make any agreements. Soviet Russia has staked out its position for the second "cold war."

FREED: ~~From the New York Herald-Tribune:~~ The New York Herald-Tribune expressed sentiments that were only slightly more tinged with hope. Said the Herald-Tribune:

CAMPY: The interesting question about Mr. Molotov's opening speech is why he should have made it at all. What advantage he could have found in repeating the old themes, reiterating hollow charges and distortions is difficult to see.... In any case the West has responded in what seems precisely the right spirit. The whole point of the Berlin gathering, Mr. Dulles suggested, was that some new note, some larger concepts, would be introduced into the discussions which have run on intermittently since the war's end.

Mr. Molotov afterwards hinted that perhaps he had not intended to be so completely negative as he appeared. Just possibly, a reversal is being prepared .. So much the better, if it is true. Meanwhile, the conference can scarcely be said to have got off to an auspicious start..

FREED: The Christian Science Monitor expresses itself in a simply drawn cartoon, entitled, "It's really a Big Five Conference." The fifth member sitting at the table and glowering threateningly at Great Britain, the United States, the Soviet Union and France -- is a cylindrical object -- labelled "H-Bomb War Threat."

FREED: And, as radio commentators chimed in with their own editorials, here is what Edward R. Murrow of the Columbia Broadcasting System had to say about the West's immediate acceptance of the agenda suggested by the Soviets:

DISC EDWARD MURROW TIME: 47

CUE: ... by the cow that jumped over the moon

IN: This feat has accomplished two things...

OUT: ... in getting down to effective action

FREED: Meanwhile, on the domestic front, newspaper editors indulged in one of their favorite sports -- lampooning Congressmen. The occasion was provided by a bill now up in Congress, to raise the salaries of Congressmen. The editorial sport has two standard tacks. First, editors print letters expounding the view that Congressmen are already overpaid for the feeble services they render a long-suffering nation. These letters are usually signed "Irate Taxpayer" or "Much-abused Citizen." Second, cartoons appear on the editorial pages, such as this one from the New York World-Telegram.. Congress, is depicted as a sly old man looking in the mirror and handing to his image a large bouquet of flowers. He is saying to his image:

PARKS: From me to you -- you great big handsome hunk of man!

INSERT AFTER P. 4

FREED: But, while unable to resist such gibes, most editors ~~xxxxxx~~ finally put themselves in favor of higher salaries for Congressman. ~~Xxxx~~ Numerous editorials this week took the line expressed in the syndicated column of Bruce Barton:

~~FREED: But at the same time, [redacted] editorial pages carried the~~ ~~[redacted]~~

CAMPY: When I was a freshman member of Congress, Fred A. Vinson, later chief justice of the United States, was a leading member, liked and respected on both sides of the aisle.

It is sad to read that he died leaving assets of only a litte over $7,000 and debts of $6,000. Sad, but not surprising to those of us who knew what happens to the finances of Congressmen.

First of all, a member of Congress must be elected every two years. The expense of an election campaign is often as much as a whole year's salary..

Second, Congress used to meet only a few weeks a year. A member could have a good deal of time to give to his own business or profession. Today's far greater problems require almost year-round sessions which means that a member must maintain two homes and leaves him no time at all for personal interests. So any member serving a long time finds himself growing poorer and poorer..

FREED: In the week just past, President Eisenhower submitted his proposed national budget to Congress -- a budget which proposed to reduce overall defense expenditures. Here are two conflicting press reactions:

The Richmond Times-Dispatch:

PARKS: Mr. Eisenhower's budget...is a credit to the President... The defense budget...calls for a reduction in Army and Navy appropriations, but increased amounts for air power and better-trained, more mobile manpower.. It is based not on a faith in massive force, but on the need to support strong national security programs over the extended period of uneasy peace.

FREED: The Atlanta Constitution:

CAMPY: Now the significance of Secretary of State Dulles' recent speech becomes apparent. Mr. Dulles announced the historic shift in the military policy of the United States. No longer will the United States... meet Russian aggression at whatever time and place Russia might choose to her greatest advantage. Instead the United States will develop its striking power until, at any agression, American planes will by-pass the incidental point of aggression and strike

~~whatever targets are deemed most profitable. They fit together, the budget message of the President and the recent speech of his Secretary of State.~~

FREED: And, taking an anxious view of the whole thing, the Courier-Journal, of Louisville, Kentucky:

PARKS: ... ~~The administration owes the nation a much more convincing explanation than any yet given for its current proposal to reduce defense expenditures by more than four billion dollars.~~ STET . It is not enough to say that less money will give us more defense -- not enough, that is, to be convincing in the light of recent history. STET STET

All Americans, we believe, will agree with the ghosts of the French economizers who lost France to the Germans in 1940, that it is better to be alive with an empty pocketbook than dead with a full one. We think it is a good thing for the country that more of the answers must be given before Congress will agree that we can whittle down defense and still have it too.

FREED: Little things, as well as big ones, received the attention of editors and commentators. And foremost among the little things were cigarettes -- as editors digested or rejected recent medical reports linking cigarettes to lung cancer. Referring to the statistical research on the subject now going on, radio commentator Eric Severeid had this to say:

DISC Severeid TIME: 1:54

CUE: to discover a trend -- if any.

IN: This reporter is baffled by all statistics...

OUT: ..and went back to smoking.

FREED: And with Eric Severeid's comments on the problems of a smoker, we conclude this roundup of opinion from the American radio and press. But while we're on the subject of science and health, let's investigate another phase of scientific research.

Dear Mr. Prime Minister:

Thank you for your gracious note regarding books on Buddhism and I shall look forward to receiving the titles from your Minister in Ceylon.

I have spoken with my colleagues regarding the possibility of your doing a television show on Buddhism, and they will communicate with Ambassador Barrington in Washington.

Dear Mr. Murrow,

Last night I had said English books on Buddhism were rubbish in reply to your request to recommend some good English books on Buddhism. When I said so I had in mind only one or two English books on Buddhism which I know. I have not read many English books on Buddhism and I admit I am not in a position to recommend.

However, there is one German Buddhist priest by the name of U Tiloka Nyana who is now living in Ceylon. He has read and written many books in English on Buddhism. He is also a practising Buddhist priest. I believe he is the most reliable person to recommend to you a list of books in English on Buddhism.

I will ask our Minister in Ceylon to get that list for you from that German Buddhist priest.

Yours Sincerely,

Maung Tin

Dear Mr. Usher:

Thank you for your letter of February 4th. I regret to have to tell you that I doubt very much that I could be of help to you in discussing your plan for better television programming. Since I am no longer an officer of CBS, I have no authority or control over programs other than my own. I am, therefore, passing your letter along to Mr. Harry Ommerle, Director of Television Programs for CBS.

Sincerely yours,

Dear Mr. Murrow:

Knowing how busy you must be I will try to make this as brief as possible. I should first introduce myself as Mrs. E. S. Valentine of San Mateo, California. I am an average young homemaker with a family of four. My advocation has always been writing. After many creative writing and short story courses I realized to succeed I should combine the two things I know and love best; in this case homemaking and writing, or- a cookbook.

I would appreciate it more than you can imagine if you would send me your favorite recipe. I would like your permission to use it in a cookbook I am compiling. This is planned as a T.V. Celebrity cookbook and I know being able to include your name and recipe would indeed be helpful in its ultimate success.

Two publishing houses have expressed an interest in this idea so I am enthused beyond words. Success of this book would mean a great deal to me.

Hope to receive your recipe and thanking you for your kindness.

Sincerely,
Mrs. E S Valentine

Dear Mr. Valerius:

Thank you for your letter of August 30th.

Your proposition does indeed sound interesting, but due to the tremendous pressure which many of our guests work under, we do not feel that it is possible to interest them in this project.

Thank you again for writing.

Dear Sirs:

I am sure you will be interested in my proposition:

I am a well-known Dutch artist (portrait painter). I came approximately ten months ago to Toronto, and have many agents all over the States who are promoting my work. As a result, I am getting recognition from the American public. I offer, to each celebrity appearing on your weekly show, an oil portrait of themselves, This portrait will be presented to them by you, as a token of appreciation. All this, of course, without any expense to you. This offer will extend for the duration of one year. My normal fee for such a portrait would be approximately $3000.

The reason for this is, that I think the best advertising for an artist is to have his portraits hang in the homes of famous and well-known people.

Looking forward to hearing from you.

Sincerely yours,

Frank de Bruin Valerius

Sooner Sky For A Queen

This is the color portrait of Queen Elizabeth. It is in Oklahoma City now, but likely will be presented to the queen in London later this year.

If Queen Elizabeth appears to be sporting a windblown bob in her latest portrait it is because that impulsive Oklahoma wind does not hark to royal command.

An Oklahoma sky will brighten Buckingham Palace when the impressive oil by Frank DeBruin Valerius is presented to the queen in a few months.

A fantastic chain of events, starting in wartime Europe, put the famous Dutch artist on the trail of some Oklahoma sunshine, highly recommended for queenly basking.

Late in the autumn of 1954 Valerius sent a request of Bill Stockwell, 1216 Sherwood Lane, Oklahoma City:

"Somebody recommended you as a photographer of Oklahoma outdoors. I would very much like a color photograph of a typical Oklahoma sky. I think it would please an old war buddy of mine.

"At present I am living in Canada. I have a commission to do Queen Elizabeth, from memory and photographs, and my client wants a pretty sky behind her.

"This set me to thinking about the terrible war years and the suffering we went through in Holland. My one bright memory of those dreary days is of a little Indian corporal from Oklahoma.

"He used to sit around, homesick as could be muttering: 'Boy, what I wouldn't give to see my Oklahoma sky!'

"This went on dozens of times a day until we could all repeat it with him. It was sort of our theme song.

"Some days he would look at the sky and murmur: 'Come together little clouds, you've almost got it. Just a little softer there in the south 40 acres, a touch more of blue. Almost, but not quite.' Like a movie director!

"He was sure a likeable chap and one day I promised him: 'Send me an Oklahoma sky and I'll paint it.'

"I never heard from him after the war, but I've always remembered him."

Stockwell sent suitable color transparencies of Oklahoma sky and heard no more about it until another letter from Valerius announced

"Am sending Queen Elizabeth to you as a gift. Complete with a de luxe Oklahoma sky. You may keep it or send it to Queen Elizabeth with your compliments.

The letter related that the client who had ordered the 25 by 30 inch canvas had died suddenly and that payment of the fee would be tied up indefinitely in estate proceedings.

"I want the queen to have it," Valerius, winner of nine international awards stated, "but since there is much of Oklahoma in the painting maybe it should come from the Sooner state."

The windblown wisps waving about the royal crown resulted from Stockwell's advisory, "You can't have an Oklahoma sky without that Oklahoma breeze. They go together like Hansel and Gretel."

Stockwell has asked Winston Churchill to present the painting to Queen Elizabeth, as intermediary.

"Especially with royalty the human touch distinguishes a masterpiece from just another portrait."

The portrait is on display at Kathryn Lipe's, Inc., 530 NW 23.

Somewhat of a sensation on the French Riviera after the war, Frank Valerius painted the royal family of Holland, Actors James Mason and Clark Gable and George Bernard Shaw and started a painting of Churchill.

"The first sitting of Churchill seemed to go smoothly," Valerius recounts, "but returning for the second sitting I discovered my subject had taken my brushes in hand and remodeled my efforts to suit himself.

"I was later horrified at my conduct, but as a brash subaltern I slammed my kit shut and stalked out. We laughed about it later in London. Churchill invited me back for another sitting but business carried me to France."

One of the foremost exponents of modern impressionist portraiture, Valerius skyrocketed to the horizon in 1950 with the coveted honor, "Best Portrait of the First Half-Century."

This was a stark, bold, powerful portrait of his father, one of the great artists and thinkers of Europe. When he was murdered by the Germans Frank DeBruin Valerius became a key man in the resistance movement.

The 33-year-old "miracle man," master of 39 styles, takes a dim view of artists who portray President Eisenhower with a big grin and all teeth exposed like license plates.

"Horrible! Simply horrible!" he exclaims.

"Maybe I'll have to do it to please the public, but I hope not. Grinning is not for canvases. The pose and expression should be such that they can be held for hours comfortably—or look that way.

"President Eisenhower should be painted seriously, quietly, with the weight and hope of the world on his shoulders."

Valerius painted both Eisenhower and England's great Marshal Montgomery, during the war, but Eisenhower was not available for direct sittings.

It was Churchill who extolled the opportunities of Canada, sending Valerius to Toronto.

While working with a limited number of American photographers, he is attempting to build up a following for his personal impressionist style.

"While your first reaction to a Modern may be negative, it grows on you. In a few days you feel you know the subject's inner being it is a medium of painting personality and character that the smooth academic pattern cannot approach.

"It has already been accepted in Europe and will catch on in North America. If I didn't think so I would simply go back to Holland."

Valerius relates that he enjoyed painting Shaw "until I discovered he was paying me in witticisms."

Dear Mr. Murrow;

Hearing you discuss Mill's essay On Liberty with Lyman Bryson and James Reston of the Times a few Sundays ago on Invitation to Learning,I was struck with your often repeated view that America is in danger of too much uniformity in an era of mass production and mass opinion,etc.

I am taking the liberty,therefore,of sending you under separate cover a desk copy of our recently adopted Official Malverne Flag.

The State Department at Albany tells us we are the first incorporated village in the State to adopt a flag,and we think we may just have a chance of being the first in the Nation.

Its symbols were selected by a thorough review of our local history,and express various activities in our civic life. It might just be that knowing of this,other communities might likewise review their unique histories and come up with something constructive to guide into a positive future. Thus from many little rills,streams might flow into the national life,renewing some of the flavor of liberty and individualism from the many sources of the local and grass-roots level.

What I Believe could thus be applied to communities and small groups,and already several Nassau Villages are discussing the adoption of flags appropriate for them. Besides,there is much good humor in the selection of symbols.

The mass movement to suburbia provides opportunities for "faceless" people to regain identity,and from that comes something which our own Taxpayer's Association has formulated for many years as "Keep Malverne off the Beaten Track."

There must be many then who feel as you do about the need for greater variety in the uniformity of our life,and I sincerely hope, of course,that you will like our little banner,and see in its idea the possibilities dramatising more of America's uniqueness.

With all best wishes, G R Van Allen

Description of the Malverne Flag

Colors---Blue, White, and Orange: those of the City of New York. Derived in the first instance from the flag of the Dutch West India Trading Company, promoters of New Netherland and of New Amsterdam.

(The most important real estate company promoting modern Malverne was the Amsterdam Development and Sales Company, August Eimer, President, Alfred H. Wagg, Resident Promoter.)

Background of Flag---White

Design---The Malverne coat-of-arms is mounted on a white background to the left or staff-end of the flag. Near the opposite or free-end, there is one double-stripe of orange (above, to the left), and blue (below, to the right) on the white background, drawn diagonally in an appropriate curve from the lower edge upward to the upper edge, ending at a short distance from the free-end.

Coat-of-Arms----A shield divided into upper and lower parts by a diagonal bar, bearing the name: MALVERNE. The left end of the bar is the low end; the right end, the high end. This bar and the above-mentioned double-stripe are roughly parallel.

TOP--Spray of oak leaves with two or three acorns.
BOTTOM--an erect chipmunk
MOTTO--"Oaks From Acorns."
UPPER SECTION-- The Dinky, dubbed the "Toonerville Trolley."
LOWER SECTION-- A ball(baseball) (to left)
Liberty Bell (in center)
Artist's palette (Upper right)
Tragic and comic masks (lower right)

A Suggested Interpretation of the Symbols on the Malverne Coat-of-Arms

Note: Symbols often suggest meanings, difficult to put into words. These symbols were selected by means of a thorough familiarity with the history of Malverne, and were chosen to suggest outstanding characteristics of that history. The value of a symbol is, among other things, that it may suggest different things to different beholders. So that this interpretation does not aim to be exhaustive, but only suggestive of what those who made this Flag and Coat-of-Arms had in mind at the time, in the stage of development Malverne had reached at the time of adoption.

Spray of Oak Leaves with Acorns--Originally this area was heavily wooded, and still remains relatively so, thanks to the careful development and selection of real estate promoters and builders. It has many fine old trees still standing, among them many oaks. This provides the factual basis for the Motto; Oaks from Acorns.

Erect Chipmunk on Haunches--Long the chosen Symbol of the Norwood Hook, Ladder, and Hose Company, Malverne's oldest organization, this symbol is the especial emblem of the Fire Department's many-times Championship Tournament Team.
The little animal symbolized is an alert, ever-active native inhabitant of these parts, well-known for helping oaks to grow by planting acorns for food. This fact provides the basis for the wider meaning of an active citizenry, ever sowing seeds of civic development, and the means thereby of enabling the great oaks of groups and organizations, and of Malverne itself to continuous growth. The Chipmunk suggests a typical Malverne citizen.

Motto-----This is now self-explanatory, verbally stating what the above symbols suggest. The present verbal form is a shortened version of the well-known proverb: "Mighty Oaks from Little Acorns Grow". With only about 2½ square miles of geography for its limits, Malverne is physically small, like a chipmunk, but from the many activities of its citizens, great growths of spiritual as well as of material harvests come forth regularly. To suggest this great fact of life and profound truth of experience that great things come from small, The Malverne Story ended with the Gospel Parable of Jesus: "A grain of mustard seed may indeed become a mighty tree." But finding this reference unfamiliar to many, and believing that the same meaning without any particular Christian connotation can be had in"Oaks From Acorns", the Historian suggested the latter for the Malverne Coat-of-Arms. This enables citizens of all faiths and of no special religious faith to share equally in the meaning of the design, as indeed they do in the life of the Village. In fact, one with a naturalistic creed, believing in some nontheistic version of the theory of evolution may find in it his own Village meaning, as readily as another of a more theistic conviction.

The Dinky--The electric storage battery car connecting Malverne with Valley Stream and the Main Line, from 1913 to 1926, and which became endeared to all early Malvernites, as the main means of reaching the new Development from New York. Always tempermental it became the center of story, folk-lore, and joke, symbolizing Malverne's dependence as a Suburban Commuters' Community on railroad transportation: a fact and tradition carried on by the Long Island Rail Road to the present day.

The Open Clam Shell-- All Long Islanders are known as "Clam Diggers" from their long-time gathering and use of clams for food. The Indians of the South Shore, our own Rockaways included, made such fine wampum from clam shells and from periwinkle, that their product passed from hand to hand through the Indian Tribes of the North American Continent; wampum being the Indian money. Our Indians might be termed the first bankers.
This symbol also suggests, being open, the opposite of the "close-mouthed", non-communicative; Malvernites being openminded, sociable, and active in promoting every good project for the welfare of the Village; Malverne's civic activity and pride being well-known far round about.

The Open Book or Bible with Quill Writing-- The first white settlers in these parts were about 20 families from Stamford, Connecticut, who under the leadership of the Reverend Richard Denton, "Puritans of Presbyterian Persuasion", bought the Hempstead Plains from the Indians, and chose as their Town Spot, the site of the present-day Hempstead. The Open Book, as Bible, therefore symbolizes their religious faith, as indeed of all adherents of the Jewish-Christian tradition. Furthermore, it represents the first text book used in the early schools; modern text-books not having been introduced till the 18th century. From it, children learned to read and to spell; and their literature consisted largely of stories from the Bible. The quill writing suggests Inspiration; the Bible being an inspired Book, the Word of God, delivered to scribes and prophets, and the Quill thus drawn, suggests the Finger of God writing the Record and Interpretation of Events for Man's Guidance.

This symbol also suggests literature in general, and learning in general; knowledge, and men's quest thereof. History, as well as Prophecy, Poetry as well as Prose, and all allied subjects; Education, Learning, and Scholarship; Amusement and Fiction, no less than Science and its Records, Philosophy, and Theology.

The Ball---This suggests Athletics and Sports, outdoors and indoors. Baseball, Football, Basketball, Softball, Tennis, etc. Recreation. The sound body for the sound mind; the educational ideal of the Schools and of the Village.

The Soft Ball League, the Little League Baseball, the Midget Football Teams, etc., and the early predominance of Tennis Courts and play.

The Liberty Bell-- This symbolizes the American Revolution; the first bloodshed of which on Long Island occurred in the Hempstead Swamps opposite the Malverne High School, at DeMott's Mill; an incident used by Kenneth Robert's in his novel, Oliver Wistwell. It also represents the Independent Party of Malverne, which includes both Republicans and Democrats, and others, and which has had so much to do with the development of Malverne's political life.

As a symbol for music, it suggests the carillon in the Community Presbyterian Church, Malverne's oldest; and the chimes in the tower of Our Lady of Lourdes, Roman Catholic Church. Furthermore, it symbolizes music in all forms, for which Malverne is well-known; the Intercommunity Concerts, the High School Choral groups, etc. Poetry, Dancing, Liberty.

The Palette-- This suggests the plastic arts, interest in which has long been active in Malverne, the Malverne Artists having developed that interest with their first President becoming President of the Nassau County Art League; and their Annual Shows widely known. Then the developing interests of Americans generally in our time in painting, sculping, etc., with courses in the People's College for the same. And finally, the work of independent artists, of whom many have lived here; together with the sometime Editor of nationally known Art Magazine, The Art Digest.

Furthermore, the general interest in beauty, so manifest in Malverne homes and schools and churches and library is also suggested by this symbol.

The Masks--- Tragic and Comic suggest the early and continuing interest and influence of Actors and the Stage in and upon Malverne, many famous men and women of that business and profession early buying land both for living in Malverne and for investment. All things pertaining to the Theatre, to the Dance, of which Malverne has long been conscious, due largely to the Lottie Atherton Dancing School; and of allied arts are suggested by these symbols. Furthermore, several early Actors worked for the Amsterdam Development and Sales Company in the early days, and took up Real Estate promotion as their sole business, when changes in Theatre and Movie techniques forced them to try something new.

Malverne was known from the start as the producer of Minstrel Shows, and of Amateur and semi-professional Theatricals, and its present Mayor was once a famous Vaudevillian, as was L. J. Bisbee, one of Malverne's early promoters.

SUMMONED TO EMBASSY

German Consul Accused of 'Lobbying'

Charges of "lobbying in American politics" resulted in a summons to the German Embassy in Washington Monday of Detroit's German consul, Dr. Wilhelm H. van Almsick.

An accusation against Dr. van Almsick was made by Detroit attorney G. Vernon Leopold, who fled the Nazi regime in Germany before World War II.

Leopold said he received a copy of a letter sent by the consul to six Detroit German-speaking lawyers asking support of the Kilgore Bill, now before Congress, "if you find that you agree with the principles therein."

Introduced by Senator Kilgore (D., W. Va.) the bill proposes restoration to German citizens of United States assets seized during World War II.

Personal property, royalty rights, patents and corporate stock belonging to German citizens and frozen in the United States are involved.

A special committee of the American Bar Association is currently studying the bill and will make recommendations Dec. 10.

IN EFFECT, Dr. van Almsick's letter asked the six attorneys to advocate approval of the bill among other lawyers if they favored it.

Dr. van Almsick said his "interest as an attorney and believer in the principle of the right to hear both parties" prompted his letter.

Leopold said he believes the request by a foreign diplomat enjoying immunity is a "violation of diplomatic custom and opposed by the ethics of international public law."

The German Embassy declined comment until it has heard van Almsick's side of the story."

Attorney at Law

Dear Mr. Leopold:

As you probably know, a Special Committee to study the Dirksen bill of the Section of International and Comparative Law of the American Law Association has issued a report, which is speaking against the Dirksen Bill (called Kilgore Bill in the 84th Congress).

At the annual meeting of the American Bar Association in Philadelphia, it was decided, that the members of the Section should vote in favor or disfavor of this report. In a letter dated October 21, 1955, the American Bar Association asked their members to give their written vote not later than December 10, 1955.

I believe that the report of the Special Committee should be weighed with careful consideration and I feel that I should mail you copy of a letter which is dealing with this question which came to my attention a few days ago and about which has to be voted.

Should you agree with the opinion stated in that letter, I would appreciate it very much if you would bring same confidentially to the attention of your attorney friends, even with changes you consider appropriate.

Thanking you in advance for your cooperation in this matter, I remain,

very sincerely yours,

Dr. W.M. van Alkemade
C o n s u l

Encls.

The members of the International and Comparative Law Section of the ABA have been asked in recent days to vote on an issue of tantamount importance ---- whether to favor or oppose the principle of sanctity of private property envisaged in the return of private assets confiscated from German and Japanese nationals as enunciated in the Dirksen bill S. 3423, 83rd Congress; introduced in the 84th Congress by Senator Kilgore (D-W. Va.), for himself and Senator Dirksen (R-Ill.). Enclosed with the ballot, there was a copy of a report attacking such return, along with short accompanying statements favoring and opposing this report.

Despite the manifestations in the accompanying to the contrary, a cursory review of the said report clearly evidences that it does not limit itself to comment on S. 3423, does not even attempt a detailed sectional analysis of this complex 15 page piece of legislation, let alone enclose a copy of the said bill for your own appraisal, but rather in broad, sweeping generalizations denounces full property return as such. In light of the comments in that statement as to the motivations of the critics of the said report, it is interesting to note that one of the authors of the report acts the capacity of legal counsel for one of the major companies which has a definite interest in these alien property matters, and from all appearances would favor a continued retention of these properties.

Obviously, there are two diametrically opposite pressures at work behind the scenes of this entire matter. To even permit the Bar to be drawn into an issue of such political controversy is questionable; however, the members find themselves in a rather hopeless position to act on such a complex matter without knowing the complete and full substantive facts on the question. As matters now stand, to adopt this report would constitute an abandonment of the long established position continually adhered to by the Bar. Even in the war years, when public sentiment naturally ran high, the House of Delegates stood firm in adhering to the basic property rights of the individual by [illegible] the report of the Committee on Custody and Management of Alien [illegible] which maintained that, "Confiscation is contrary to the principles of law. It is contrary to our constitutional law principles, and [illegible] principles of international law. When the reign of law for which [illegible] fighting returns, parties injured by confiscation may be expected to seek just redress, and a just administration of law may be expected to award such redress. It has been so in the past, and if the traditional concepts of justice have meaning, it will be so [illegible]

3. Misconcept of fundamental principles, in that the report stated, "that if any general rule that an enemy's private investments should be returned to him following a war ever existed ---- the distinction between old-time war and the totality of modern warfare would require its change" ----- It is self evident that where we as lawyers add to the destructiveness of warfare, by abolishing the fundamental rights of private property, then we will certainly bring about the total collapse of our legal, economic, and social structure.

4. Misunderstanding of the Bonn Convention ... the German Government has never assumed the obligation to reimburse property owners, and even the provision that it would act in the capacity of guarantors, was objected to by the Bundestag by means of a special resolution, Prof. Edwin Borchard of the Yale Law Faculty stated that, "substitution of a bad debtor for a good debtor ---- is a mere subterfuge, doing no credit to the integrity of modern times. ---- It was a subterfuge to avoid the inevitable charge of confiscation".

5. Mistaken inferences that return would be predicated solely on major windfalls ---- Much of the property has decreased in value, this is especially true in the case of patents, etc. Therefore, the only practical method by which a return could be effected would be a return at the present values irrespective of individual increases or decreases.

Our Government has recognized the sanctity of private property in the return of confiscated assets to Italian nationals. To do as much in this instance with Germany and Japan would reaffirm the principles of inviolability of private property which we have continously maintained.

Thus the rejection of the report would not commit this Section to any new pronouncements on this highly controversial political issue, but this matter would merely revert to the steadfast objective position of adherence to fundamental rights of property taken by our Association since 1943, and which was adopted only after a long and intensified study of the highly technical problem by a Committee organized and composed especially for this purpose. Today, to act hastily on the matter, without a proper study of all the varied and relevant issues and completely reverse our established position would certainly not reflect credit on us as attorneys.

S. 3423 was almost unanimously approved by the Senate Judiciary Committees which was composed of Senators Wm. Langer (R-N.D.), Alexander Wiley (R-Wis.), Wm. Jenner (R-Ind.), Arthur Watkins (R-Utah), Everett Dirksen (R-Ill.), Herman Welker (R-Idaho), John Butler (R-Md.), the late Pat McCarran (D-Nev.), Harley Kilgore (D-W. Va.), James Eastland (D-Miss.), Olin Johnston (D-S.C.), Thomas Hennings (D-Mo.) and John McClellan (D-Ark.). Enclosed herewith is a photostatic copy of the report recommending Senate adoption of S. 3423 by this highly respected and important Committee of Congress, after a study of the problem for some four years. I believe that it will provide you with a wealth of objective information on the subject, without the prejudice of any special interests.

Furthermore, the statement which we are asked to vote on and which attacks this Senate Committee report is objectionable to my mind in a number of legal and factual instances, such as:

1. Misinterpretation of the effect of the Paris Reparations Agreement and other International Agreements as a bar to return --- No less an authority than Secretary of State Dulles has stated: "As a matter of interpretation of that (Paris Reparations) agreement it can be argued that it was not intended to operate in perpetuity but was designed as a temporary measure --- the action which you contemplate (full return of all vested property) is not only consistent with the powers of Congress but also is compatible with the underlying agreement itself."

2. Misconstrued report that the continued and permanent retention of these properties will not amount to confiscation --- Speaker of the House of Representatives, Sam Rayburn in denouncing the theory that private assets be held in this manner stated that "Every writer upon international law in America from that time to now who has been recognized as an authority has taken the position that the sound doctrine ever announced by any people anywhere was that private property should be taken for the satisfaction of a public obligation

Dear Ed:

I want to join Harold Russell in thanking you for your personal contribution to the World Veterans Fund. It was very unexpected, but very much appreciated.

Fine reports on your "Person-to-Person" visit with the Russells are still coming in and so is the money -- at last count the Fund was close to $2,000 richer as a direct result of the appeal Harold was able to make on your show. Hundreds of the letters have come in with anywhere from one dollar to five dollars tucked inside, and their postmarks prove that you have alert, generous viewers in just about every corner of America.

Thanks again for introducing the Fund and Federation to millions of Americans it might have taken us years to meet without your help.

Dear Ed:

I am leaving for Europe on October 5 for a visit to the headquarters of the World Veterans Federation in Paris, so am not going to be able to see Harold Russell on your show next Friday night. Knowing him as I do, it ought to be a lively and interesting program for you and I am sorry that I will not be here to see it.

Harold has told me of his conversation with you this morning and I am extremely pleased that you are giving him this opportunity to tell something of the work of the Federation. It is growing considerably in effectiveness and size with a membership now of 125 associations in 31 countries representing a total of some 18,500,000 ex-servicemen.

This is merely a note of thanks for your help in our attempt to create interest in (and raise money for) the World Veterans Fund.

N e w-Y o r k.

Dear Mr Murrow,

A couple of years ago I already introduced to you my friend Dr E. van der Vlugt, well-known Dutch barrister and journalist in Paris, author of the well-known book "ASIA AFLAME" (Communism in the East), which was a great succes in the United States and was discussed favourably by the leading periodicals in America, a copy of which is in your possession.

Especially now with a view to the so-called "pacific co-existance" between Moscow-Peking and the free-nations, I am here convinced that in this period we must now be twice as much on the alert.

And this both in order not to let the armament of Europe in the NATO slacken for a moment, and in order to further the Atlantic community and co-operation in the most succesful way.

Since Dr Van der Vlugt is now in New York with practical and concrete plans to further this especially, I should be very much obliged with respect to our old friendship if you would give him, in spite of your time being most occupied, every possible co-operation.

Trusting that this letter, which will be handed over to you by Dr Van der Vlugt, will be received by you in good health, I am,

Yours very sincerely

CONFIDENTIAL MEMORANDUM

Re: Underground Movement in Europe.

"...We need much more of a sharpshooting approach to our "target" groups. There is no "European mind", but scores of group attitudes compounded along all sorts of professional, economic, and geographic lines. And the best way to get at them is through people that talk the separate lingoes."

William H.Whyte,Jr. (Fortune): IS ANYBODY LISTENING?

30.000 anti-Communist cells

The situation in western Europe today, and particularly in France, is far more critical than the public has been permitted to become aware. Communism as a spiritual infection of Godless materialism has spread so rapidly especially in France, that even in Western Europe the real extent of this spiritual danger is only known to a few, since it got hold of an idea which knows no frontiers. Many circles are infected without being conscious of the fact. As opposed to the militant ideology of communism is a prevailing lethargy and an almost complete paralysis of the will for vigorous self-defense.

It is this paralysis of the heart and will that lies at the root of the European problem today. This spiritual paralysis is the cause of the tragic dissension in Western Europe, about which you can read in the papers every day. It hinders also the building up of the N.A.T.O.-forces. Against this the European statesmen are almost powerless, however well meaning they may be.

A too heavy task for the U.S.A.

This, in turn, has led to the further consequence of making the burden of the defense of the Western world fall almost entirely upon the United States. This condition cannot remain in permanent balance, since it is beyond the economic means of the United States to continue this support indefinitely. Western Europe must help also in military matters, but primarily spiritually. Of Western Europe is France the main keystone. From France a strong current must flow out through Europe; an honest, heartfelt readiness to realize our common civilization and to defend it.

Active forces in Europe.

There are at work in Europe forces attempting to strengthen the will of its peoples to stand actively for Western civilisation, for Christianity and the liberty that flows from it. However the kinds of activities in which the Churches can engage as such are limited by a varying complex of circumstances. This is particularly true of France, as will be readily understood by those familiar with the peculiar French situation.

New underground movement.

There has sprung up spontaneously, however, within the community of Western Europe, a great effort and movement. Its main strength is in France, where it is working to impenetrate French life from within the various social groupings and levels.

For the expression "French individualism" is no empty phrase. French society is highly startified, characterized at a thousand points by diversity of local, group and occupational interests and attitudes. The individualistic Frenchman makes up his mind, not upon the impact of mass advertising or general appeals (which he instinctively mistrusts), but forms his judgements slowly and shrewdly as he is influenced by persons close to him in his own particular group, whose interests are identical with his own, and who he knows he can trust. This is why the "cell" type of organization is necessary to the influencing of French opinion. The communists discovered this long ago and practiced it with great success for years.

Our movement forms an exact b l u e p r i n t of this method. You will now understand why this new movement must necessarily work underground. Unseen by the outside world, it has built up silently and carefully thousands of cells throughout the whole of France and the neighbouring countries. The purpose is to furnish the spiritual and emotional basis which can alone give rise to a great dynamic upsurge of defense action springing from the people themselves.

Results.

You will naturally wish to know something about the results, although you will understand that the nature of the work makes it impossible to tell everything here. Some things however can be told in confidence.

THIS NEW UNDERGROUND IS THE ONLY ORGANIZATION FOR THE FIGHTING OF COMMUNISM WHICH HAS ON A LARGE SCALE INDIVIDUAL (!) CONTACT WITH COMMUNISTS THEMSELVES.

Everyone who knows how i n d i v i d u a l i s t i c the European and especially the Frenchman is, realizes that only in this way, in a contact of man to man, can the ideological strength of communism as a pseudo-religion be broken.

In this way, in France alone, tens of thousands of communists and fellow travellers have been converted. The latest published figures have shown that communism in France has declined in membership.

A danger.

Only a similar underground movement can bring success. There is, however, danger on all sides. Communism itself is very strictly organized, and leaves nothing undone to attempt to liquidate that of her dangerous adversary. Our Underground is so organized that communism cannot grasp it now or in the future.

The work takes place silently, and in a sense secretly, either publicity (no matter how favorable) or visibility might be fatal to it. This is so even though its purpose is not military and its methods are exclusively those of persuasion and conviction through contact of person with person. Not being able to see it, the communists cannot attack it with success. If by chance they do find one cell and destroy it, the rest of the vast, d e c e n t r a l i z e d operation continues. Today there are several hundreds of thousands of persons working together in it. Most of them do not know each other. For obvious reasons it is strictly forbidden to give precise figures as to the numbers participating. But it is working in thousands of local centres.

Those who know it believe that in it lies the one best hope of providing the inner spiritual strength and will, that France and Western Europe, must have if they will rise to the necessities of their own defense.

The organization works quite independently.

It must be made clear that this movement has not asked, will not ask for official endorsement, either in Europe or abroad. In certain circles any such connection would be fatal to the winning of large numbers of men who must be influenced if the desired end is to be accomplished.

Moreover, in France, the endorsment of Government would at once lead to communist penetration and infiltration.

If the Government of the United States were to endorse it or give it open financial aid, the communists would brand it as "an American propaganda agency", which would be the kiss of death so far as reaching the unpersuaded is concerned. And the movement has no other function than to persuade. The fact is, that while the United States Government has spent about six million dollars for "propaganda" in France during the last year, its effect has been almost wholly neutralized by the fact that it is k n o w n to be paid for by American money. Further, it has been conducted along lines of mass advertising that have actually offended millions of Frenchmen, and with the communists gleefully "exposing" this "foreign attempt to control French opinion"; on balance the effort has probably made more enemies than friends for the United States. The movement of which this memorandum speaks simply cannot afford to run this risk. It is a truly indigenous movement, an answer to the prayerful question asked by so many Americas: "Why doesn't Europe do something for itself?".

Financial means.

The movement does lack sufficient financial resources. In spite of the fact that most of those working in it are unpaid, no movement of this scope could possibly operate without money. Those who are in positions of leadership in it who can afford to do so have given of their money, as well as their time, sacrificially. Travel must be paid for, postage, mailing, printing - the whole list of expenses which anyone familiar with organization understands cannot be donated. A few people are paid -- on a scale pitifully inadequate--simply because they could not otherwise give their time and continue to support their families. Yet, even so, the actual amounts necessary for carrying on what may prove to be the most important work in Europe today, are extremely modest as compared with even a much smaller organization in the United States. Its administrators are frugal and dedicated men. Not a centime is wasted.

At the time of writing something of a real crisis has developed. Those in it have given over and over again, some almost all they have. Their very ability to pay for bare necessities is strained to the limit. Some of the printed matter ordinarily sent for the guidance and help of the members has had to be temporarily discontinued. This is a serious matter.

Even more serious is the effect of this financial stringency upon the growth of the movement. Everything depends upon growth. Now, in France, it reaches into every department, into thousands of towns and villages. It must reach many thousands more if its purpose is to be accomplished. Everybody concerned is meeting the crisis with coolness, courage and faith. But they need-and deserve-the prayers and the tangible support of those who share their faith and purpose, wherever they may be.

If this effort can be maintained and is successful in doing what it has set out to do, it will mean that Europe can be modilized to take upon itself the major burden of its own defense. That, in turn, would lift the burden that now lies heavily on the American taxpayer. In that sense, every American dollar that goes to this cause may eventually be returned to the donor a hundredfold. Not that this is or ought to be the main reason for extending such support. The main reason is, that it will immeasurably aid in an effort to meet and defeat Communism in the realm of the human spirit, so that there may not be war at all, or, if it comes, that it may be fought with much greater prospects of victory. For an indigenous movement such as this, by contact of European on European just where and as they live and think, without the enormous waste and expense of mass-propaganda, is something that many Americans have longed to see. Now that it is here, it is to our supreme interest to support it.

Dear Ed.,

Thank you for your kind letter. I hope the Ambassador will attend your services regularly.

I am writing this letter especially to introduce to you Mr. E. Van der Vlugt, the author of the book "Asia inflammed", whom I have known for a number of years. He always attends our services when he is in Paris and considers himself a member of our Congregation. His work in combating Communism in Europe and especially in France has been of the highest order and the most effective. The extensive underground service which he has organized in counter-communistic cells has been extraordinary. If you can give him a few moments he shall tell you about it.

I can vouch for his probity, ability and devotion. He is meeting this problem on the level of the battle of ideals and I feel sure you will be interested in what he is doing.

With all good wishes for your work,

Cordially yours

My dear Senator:

This is a brief note to say that I am personally acquainted with the excellent work which is being done in France by Mr. Van-der-Vlugt, the author of "Asia ... Aflame", who, with a group of others in France, is infiltrating the country with anti-communist documentation. This is a most important work of a confidential underground nature.

He remembers with pleasure his meeting with you in Washington and wishes to give you a report on the French situation and if possible to have you visit their "underground headquarters". I hope that something may come of this as the work seems to me to be very important.

Thanking you for any courtesy you may show him, I am,

Faithfully yours

THE THIRD KOREA

OUR LAST ROUND BEFORE WORLD WAR III

Address given before the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations

by

Dr. E. van der Vlugt

May 20, 1954

Gentlemen:

I would first like to express my thanks for the honor of being permitted to address you and talk to you briefly about the extremely grave situation in Asia. Of course, I know you Senators and Congressmen are very much aware of the problem and indeed know some aspects of it better than I do. But I feel that there are some points which must be emphasized so I hope you will forgive me if I go over ground with which you are already familiar.

AVOIDING WORLD WAR III

What is our problem - the problem in all our minds? Is it not - how can we save the world? How can we avoid World War III without military involvement?

KOREA I, II and III

Already we have been drawn into military struggles which have paved the way for this dreaded third - and perhaps last war. We have had Korea I - and the flames of that have seared and scorched us. They are hidden under the ashes ready to leap up at any time. The flames are by no means dead there.

Now in Indo-China we have Korea II. Here, I am afraid, there is a tendency to put all the blame for failure on France. Superficially France is demoralized. But we must not forget that France has been fighting this Second Korea nearly alone for seven years. And this was a France weakened by two world wars which deprived her of the bent of her manpower and much of her energy. Gentlemen - put yourselves in their position.

Can you imagine the United States fighting in Korea for seven years? What would you say to the electors if year after year you had to go out to them and ask them for their sons and their money? What answers would you have?

The best solution that could be found for Korea I was a stalemate. We shall be lucky if we can reach even such an unsatisfactory conclusion in Indo-China.

And then we shall have the next- and greatest - problem on our hands. How are we to prevent Korea III? One third of Asia is already lost to Communism. We must no lose the rest of Asia. There is still time.

But Gentlemen - The hands of the clook are at ten minutes to twelve. We must act at once - but we must act with a clear and certain knowledge of what we face in our minds. We must know the right questions as well as the answers. And you, gentlemen, as the legislators of the greatest country in the world must know these questions and answers when you are in Congress, when you are in Committees, and above all, when you go out to face the voters in this year's elections.

MILITARY MEANS IMPOSSIBLE

First, we must realize that a military solution to our problem is almost impossible. Indo-China - and China and the U.S.S.R. can engulf any army as Russia once engulfed the might of Napoleon. Bombing the cities of China would have almost no military value and would psychologically turn all of Asia against us.

IDEOLOGICAL AND ECONOMIC MEANS

No - the methods we use must be ideological and economic ones. Suppose, for instance, that France were to put 500.000 men into Indo-China - and the U.S. contributed 500.000 men. They would travel the 10.000 ,iles from France and the 10.000 miles from the United States - for what purpose? To be swallowed up in the insatiable maw of the Communist world. And the rest of Asia would turn against us. We must understand the problems of Asia, from Pakistan to Indonesia, and then apply the right solutions to the whole area with all our energy.

ASIAN COMMUNISM

But first we must understand the facts of Asian Communism. To begin with its extent and power.

If you look at the map you will see the extent of Russian power in Central Asia. Over the past ten years Russia has developed in the Central Asian Soviets a great industrial network of underground factories. It has been estimated that the value of this Central Asian production is 80 billion dollars a year - and we do not know how much more is being produced in Northern Asia and Siberia. This great mass of industry is concentrated directly over the vulnerable heart of South-Asia and yet is itself almost invulnerable. Modern bombers could reach this area but their targets are invisible - and unmapped. Bombers would have to fly in daylight - circle for a long time in the faint hope of finding their objective, and would almost inevitably be shot down.

Communications in Central and North Asia have been notoriously bad in the past. But it is known that the Russians are building road systems - which would not be so greatly harmed by bombing as railroads - linking all this area and jointing up with China.

U.S. WEAKNESS TO BOMBING

Compare this wide-spread network of power to that of the United States. You will remember the statement of President Eisenhower - that 40% of American industry could be crippled overnight. We could, of course, inflict immense damage on Russia and China. But for us it might be too late. It must not happen.

CHINESE COMMUNISM

Now let us look at the other Communist giant - at China. One thing is important - we must understand that there are differences between Russian and Chinese Communism. The strength of Chinese Communism is nationalism. The Chinese look to their past to justify their aims for the future. They were once the dominant power in Asia. They either ruled directly - or took tribute from - Korea, Formosa, Indo-China, Malaya - even Indonesia, in many cases until very recently. Indo-China had a special dependent status till 1884 and Korea was Chinese until 1900. The Chinese call their land "The Kingdom of the Middle Earth" and the Communist Chinese aim to restore it to its former position. They have the same strong emotional feelings about the lost territories as France feels about Alsace-Lorraine - or as the U.S. would feel, to make a wild statement, if Canada were to annex Alaska.

The Chinese have already made a bid for Korea and are now doing the same thing in Indo-China, the Second Korea. The past and the present of China here join hands - the Communist ideology is reinforced by the traditions of the past.

Communism adds to this nationalism, to this sense of empire, another feeling. This feeling is hatred, and the object of this emotion is the West. The people of China - and of all South-Asia - attribute all their misfortunes - all their backwardness - to the wicked machinations of the Western imperialists and capitalists, and it is very easy for Communism to equate its aims with those of nationalism. Communism will free them from the hated chains of the past - Communism will unable them to attain equality with theother nations of the world - Communism will feed them where they once starved. And because it appeals to emotions that the people know and understand it is all too often successful. And China is the apostle of this new religion of hate through Asia - just as Russia is in Europe and the United States.

RUSSIA AND CHINA

This nationalist Communism in China, however, while it is now a danger to us, may be in the end a source of hope. At the present, Russia and China present a united front. But China is not a satellite of Russia and Russia has made mistakes there before. Lenin tried to introduce orthodox Marxism in 1923 and wanted to concentrate on the city proletariat. Mao ignored this policy and went to the villages where he won his power. In 1946, when the Communist armies were successful in China - with almost no help from Russia, Russia proposed they enter the Comintern. The Chinese Minister of the Interior flatly refused. He said: "We are Chinese - we are going to lead the destiny of Asia." So long as Russia helps China in its aim of industrialization the two will remain friendly. But the Chinese are suspicious of any foreign pressure, and if Russia fails in its commitments or treats China as anuthing but an equal there will be trouble.

GENEVA

But - at the present Russia and China are united. And this is the big mistake of the Geneva conference - we have picked completely the wrong time and wrong methods to try and negotiate. The Western world is not showing a united front - and we are trying to negociate under the rules of Western diplomacy, when all that the East respects is the armed fist - and we dar not use that fist. That is the reason why the fall of Dienbienphu is such a slap in the face to the West - not because of any great strategic value but because it lowers our prestige in the eyes of the Asians.

PROBLEMS OF ASIA

Now I would briefly like to consider the problems of non-Communist Asia. As I see it, there are four main problems.
They are:

1. Infiltration of Communism
2. Fanatic Nationalism
3. Weakness because of the lack of capable administrators
4. Economic

First, infiltration of Communism. Very often this comes from the resident Chinese, who are the bankers, traders and shop-keepers of Asia. They are seldom absorbed into the country- above everything else they remain Chinese. Many of them have ideologically accepted Communism, and this wealthy influential group forms a Communist Fifth Column - ready to step in at the first opportunity.

Second, fanatic nationalism. In the recently independent countries of Asia, the "West" and "Capitalism" are synonyms for "Colonialism" - the symbol of everything they hate and fear. In their fight against colonialism many of the leaders realize that idealistic socialism and Marxist Communism are by no means the same thing. They still cannot see the disastrous consequences of Communism. To them Russia and China are benevolent "Big Brothers". They believe that Communism has raised Russia and China from poverty and weakness to prosperity. To them, the Communist preach hope.

Thirdly, in many of these countries there is an almost complete lack of capable administrators. This problem will perhaps be remedied in time but there is the economic problem. This is so immense and baffling that it almost defies description - yet it is so basic that it must be comprehended. The West has already had a glimmering of this problem and in a tentative way has tried to do something about it; we have had President Truman's Point Four, U.S. and U.N. Technical Assistance and the Commonwealth Colombo Plan. Yet these plans seem to have accomplished very little in the material sense and they have not only not increased the pre-Western continent but even provoked irritation against the West. Perhaps this is a natural human reaction, since the newly independent peoples have usually found their dismay that political independence and the adoption of some forms of Western democracy has not also brought an end to their economic backwardness.

The West has also, I think, made two assumptions that are quite wrong. The first is, that if you teach a backward people business and industrial techniques they will immediately go out and do likewise. The incompetence, the laziness and the corruption of many of peoples have been ignored or only discovered after immense frustration and loss.

There has also been the tendency to consider capital as transportable and transplantable, like a gramophone that will give music wherever you take it. But capital to be productive demands certain social and political conditions - and also certain habits of mind in the population. It is true that the West achieved an enormous advance over the rest of the world in the formation of reproductive capital because of a unique set of circumstances at a given moment in our history. But there were also three very important reasons: the puritanical desire to save; the strong desire to increase profit; and the mobility and adaptability of our craftmanship. None of these conditions are to be found in South Asia at the present time.

There is the possible alternative of building up capital internally. Here we run up against another set of difficulties. Saving is the basis of capital. But 70 to 85% of the People of South Asia live by agriculture, mostly on the brink of starvation and there is absolutely no surplus for them to save. The individual effort of this group counts for almost nothing. In the second place the Asian labourer lacks the instinct for gain of his Western counterpart. He is content to live from hand to mouth and if in one day he makes enough money to buy food for two days he simply does not work on the second day. Why should he? He has enough to eat and he is supremely unconcerned if a factory or plantation is completely disrupted by the absenteeism of himself and his cousins and uncles and aunts.

However, it must be assumed that there is no capital in these areas. There is a great deal of capital - particularly in India and Indonesia - in the hands of an extremely small group. But instead of being used to make more capital as it would in the West through investment it is locked up in precious stones, in gold, in land and real estate, or in export and import business. It is seldom, if ever, risked in big enterprises or industry.

INDONESIA

All of these problems are to be found in varying degrees in the countries of South Asia. But internal Communism, fanatic nationalism, economic weakness and administrative chaos are all found in one country of vital importance to the West - that is, Indonesia. Indonesia is the third potential Third Korea. It is one of the richest countries in the world. It produces rubber, tin, oil, bauxits, rice, spices and many of its resources have hardly been tapped. Materially it would be a tremendous prize for the Communist world. In addition it is of immense strategic importance. The islands stretch in an immense half-circle from Malaya in the West almost to the Philippines in the East and Australia in the South East. If, as has happened in the last war, they are in the hands of enemies of the West, they constitute a terrific threat to Australia and New Zealand and they can effectively cut off South East Asia with the inevitable loss of Singapore, and Malaya. With all of South-East Asia under Communist Control, Asian Communism would be able to concentrate on India, Pakistan, the Middle East - and as I showed you earlier on the map - these areas are already gravely threatened from Soviet Central Asia. From the Point of view of economic strategy the loss would also be a heavy one, since the oil-wells of Sumatra and Borneo and New Guinea are the only ones on the whole Pacific area that lie close to the possible base of operations. It would also mean the loss of the two most valuable harbours in this area.

Gentlemen, you may think these facts have some hypothetical interest. On the contrary, it is, I believe, of the utmost importance that you should keep Indonesia in the foreground of your consciousness all the time. Indonesia is ready to fall like a ripe plum into the hands of the Communists unless we forestall them. It will be our Third and most disastrous Korea if we are not on guard.

SOLUTION

What then must be done to prevent Indonesia and all the other countries of South Asia from becoming Communist? The biggest problem is economic. But, you will say, all our previous experiments have borne little fruit. What is the use of America pouring good money after bad, or making investments only to have them nationalized, of seeing money wasted through corruption and ineffenciency? We forget that these plans have all too often ignored the psychology of Asia and have tried to implant an alien economic ideal in unfruitful soil. It must be realized that Asia is undergoing two revolutions at the moment - in China and in India. The Chinese is a revolution of force - the Indian one of persuasion. Both these countries have an immense influence with Asians and they are watching eagerly to see which revolution will succeed. It must be the Indian one. Even if we do not agree with much of the Indian revolution it is the only alternative in Asia and it must therefore be supported to the hilt. An expenditure of 1% of our arms budget a year could ensure the success of the Indian experiment. It seems a small amount to pay to prevent Korea Three and perhaps World War Three.

India is only part of the economic solutions however. There must be planning for the whole area - and it must be rigidly disciplined planning. We must recognize that we cannot transplant Western Capitalism in a wholesale fashion that free enterprise will only droop and die. We must work with the means that fit Asia - in this case through strong government and having worked out definite plans we must be prepared to see that they are carried out. And we must not go into such an enterprise in the spirit of "Do-goodism" - or with the hope of economic gain. We must do it with clear vision that this is a necessary expenditure - a defense expenditure if you like - and carry out the planning with the efficiency of a military manoeuver.

Ideological Means

At the same time we must bring about an ideological revolution. We must beat Moscow and Peking at their own game. As opposed to the incentive of hate we must instill the incentive of profit. We must use nationalism for the right ends instead of the wrong ones. And above all we must help the people of Asia to de these thins themselves - let them know they are bringing about their own redemption. As your great President Lincoln said: "You can't bring about prosperity by discouraging thrift" and "You can't help men permanently by doing for them what they could and should do for themselves". We must help Asia to do things for itself.

ASIA AFLAME AND INFORMATION SERVICE

In this area I think I can be of some use to you, I have written a book which your State Department and Information Service feel can be of value in enlightening the world to the real situation in Asia.

They feel it should be published in Asian languages. But it should also be adapted to the psychology of each different nation. (Your Ambassador to Thailand, Mr. Donovan, has already accomplished the publication of 500.000 pamphlets of a condensed version of "Asia Aflame" specially adapted to that country). The book should also be available cheaply - as you know, that is one of the greatest weapons of the Soviet propaganda, and will therefore need subsidies since it will have to be published in editions below cost.

I am also part of a group in Europe which is a center for information on South East Asia and has many experts attached to it.

In this talk I have very roughly sketched some of the problems of Asia. I have prepared a second volume of "Asia Aflame" with an analysis of the political, psychological, religious and economic factors. Should you wish to see this very carefully planned and charted analysis I can make up the scheme so that you will have the facts at your finger-tips when you are before Congress and the voters. I think they might help you to draw up a plan which will be the saving, not only of Asia, but of the world.

I have just read a book. It is called ASIA AFLAME. The author is a Dutchman, Dr. Ebed van der VLUGT, a lawyer of Amsterdam, who has had long years of contact with Asia ... I am sure that every man and woman in America, interested in public affairs, will be greatly helped by reading Dr. van der Vlugt's book.

ASIA AFLAME , by Dr. E. van der Vlugt, is brief but inclusive, factual but extremely readable. Believable. Revealing. The author knows his subject, presents it convincingly without ranting. Should be widely read to understaand Asian conflicts.

A European with an "Asia First" point of view, politically, is about as rare as the man who gets in the news by biting a dog ... This lends the interest of novelty to a survey of Asia after the war by an eminent Dutch lawyer, Dr. Ebed van der Vlugt, who possesses a specialized knowledge of Indonesia and a good all-round acquaintance with the politics and economics of Asia ... There are a few inaccurate and questionable statements in the book ... In the main, however, the book is a reliable political guide to modern Asia.

William Henry Chamberlin.

NEW REPUBLIC, New York, N.Y. April 13, 1953:

In his book ASIA AFLAME, Ebed van der Vlugt presents a dramatic review of Communism's sweep through most of the mainland of Asia ... As a British Intelligence officer and an influential Netherlands lawyer and newspaperman, the author has amassed more than superficial knowledge of the struggle which goes on there.

Gordon Walker.

X THE AMERICAN MERCURY, New York, March-April 1953:

Ebed van der Vlugt's ASIA AFLAME is an ambitious and thought-provoking attempt to survey the whole story of Communist strategy in the East ... Dr. van der Vlugt is very obviously a man whose practical experience has been enriched with serious thought on fundamental human questions ... An enormous amount of material is covered. The discussion of Southeast Asia and Indonesia is particularly valuable, as this is the section Dr. van der Vlugt knows best personally and on which there is the least material available ... Its greatest merit lies in the effort Dr. van der Vlugt makes to get at the underlying causes of Communist success.

THE EAGLE WICHITA, Feb. 9, 1953:

... the author goes ahead to present what is possibly the best and most fully documentation of Russian ideological conquest of Asia yet told. Clearly and logically, using maps, charts and diagrams ... The book is a masterpiece of analysis and psychological insight that will be of interest to both the student of the subject and to the average citizen following the daily news.

Jim Nelson.

VOICE OF ST. JODE, April 1953:

The chapter on Indonesia, the area that seems best known to the author, is almost a masterpiece, clarifying and explaining conditions in that chaotic and highly complex land with restraint and evident scholarship ... ASIA AFLAME is an important book.

Ebed van der Vlugt's "ASIA AFLAME" has more information on the Communist attack at all points and a sounder analysis of the best means to meet it, than this reviewer has found anywhere else in a fairly wide search of the field ... this talented Dutch barrister gives his facts in compact, readable, easily digestible form. He hammers home his conclusions brilliantly and forcefully ... In the international fields, this book merits place as a big book of the year ... Few books have more sense and less superfluous verbiage ... And what a book writer !

William B. Ruggles.

COURIER, Pittsburgh, Pa. June 20, 1953:

THE FREE PRESS, Colorado Springs, Colo, February 8, 1953:

Dr. van der Vlugt documents his stratements. His facts are carefully researched and bear every mark or proper placement ... ASIA AFLAME provides a good background to Asia. ASIA AFLAME is a pure joy to read ... Dr. van der Vlugt tells the story from our side, and tells it with scholarly clarity, practical judgment and warm lively style ... Dr. van der Vlugt has given the best analysis of why Asia is aflame that this reviewer has ever seen ... Every chapter is priceless ... Here is an ideal work for use by voluntary discussion groups ... There is hope while books as effective as this are written by people on our side.

CATHOLIC REVIEW SERVICE, St. Marys, Kansas:

For moderately informed Westerners who understand but slightly the reasons for the seething ferment among postwar Asiatic peoples, Dr. van der Vlught's book is an excellent guide ... Dr. van der Vlugt deserves commendation for his clear understanding and emphasis of the totalism of Communistic ideology ... American readers will be especially rewarded by seeing another side, the Dutch side, to the question of Indonesian independance.

John F. Clarkson, S.J.

HUMAN EVENTS, March 18, 1953:

ASIA AFLAME is an encyclopedic roundup of the Orient, and there are chapters in it, notably those on Indo-China and Indonesia, that carry a freight of information that will come as virgin news to most Americans. But the real importance of the book lies in its appreciation of the eastward orientation of Soviet foreign policy under Lenin and Stalin ... Lenin summed it up in a capsule: "The East will one day put an end to the West-" ... His book is definitely superior reporting ... Risking a prophesy, I should say that this makes van der Vlugt more important than ever.

NEW YORK, N.Y. February 6, 1953:

Brilliantly written, and your conclusions are, in my opinion, most sound. I know of no other book which gives such insight into the background and the forces at work in the Far East. Your book should deservedly reach a large public, as it is an important contribution to an understanding of world affairs at the moment.

Carl Glick.

Los Angeles, Cal. May 9, 1953: BROADCAST: X

I have just completed reading the magnificent treatise "ASIA AFLAME", of Dr. van der Vlugt, and would unhesitatingly say that in comprehensiveness of understanding of the Communist world strategy, in scholarly presentation ... it is the outstanding book ever published in this country. Many others have eyes to observe and pens to report their observations, but Dr. van der Vlugt has a mind to interpret and a knowledge of the scientific laws of Communism to predict.

Fred Schwarz.

THE COMMONWEALTH, New York, N.Y. March 13, 1953:

Van der Vlugt has a number of historical misconceptions about China ... When he writes of Siam he ignores the main reason why this is the only country in all Asia which is almost entirely free of Communists ... From Mr. van der Vlugt, who speaks with authority, one might expect some sound proposals, but what he offers is a disappointment.

Joseph R. Fiszmann.

ASIA AFLAME

Communism in the East

By Ebed Van der Vlugt

Foreword by General Albert C. Wedemeyer.

This is the one book alert Americans who want fully rounded understanding of the critical role of Asia in today's world struggle with Communism cannot afford to miss.

Other books have been written about Asia. Other books have been written about Communism. But not until publication of ASIA AFLAME has any writer so much as attempted to tell the full story of Communist infiltrations and objectives in Asia from their beginning in 1918 until now: for the continent as a whole, and country by country, with illustrations, full documentation, and copious maps in color so that you can follow what happened step by step. When you finish this epoch-making book you will understand as never before the "Why" and "How" of Communist global strategy, and the supremely important part that Communist domination of Asia plays in it.

Brilliantly, this Dutch editor, lawyer and Far East expert takes you under the surface of confused external events. You will be fascinated and informed as he lays bare the inner forces and tensions that have developed among Asiatic peoples in the last fifty years. You will see how Communism has taken shrewd advantage of them, and how we for our part may counter the strategies of the Kremlin with higher and better strategies if we will only give understanding, sympathetic support to the aspirations of the billion people who may become our enemies, but who still could become our friends.

Dear Mr. Van Dyke:

Thank you for your letter of September 22nd.

We are indeed happy to grant you permission to use the title "This I Believe".

As you may be aware, this title already has been used in other instances by groups at universities. We have in fact, just given permission for use of the title to the University of Michigan for their autumn religious lectures.

Mr. Edward R. Murrow

Dear Mr. Murrow:

I have never had the pleasure of meeting you but a general familiarity with your work and ideas encourages me to write this letter.

I am a Trustee of Westminster College, a Church related Liberal Arts College for men, located at Fulton, Missouri. You will probably associate the name and place with Mr. Churchill's prophetic Iron Curtain speech given on our campus some years back. The College is, however, well known in this area as an institution of exceptional standing and accomplishments in education.

Our greatest handicap at this time is our very inadequate endowment income and for the last two years we have sought through a series of letters to develop interest in bequests for this purpose. It occurred to some of us that we might secure statements from certain well regarded alumni and friends, which could be used in connection with this program and with particular effect if we might use your well known title "This I Believe".

We would, in that event, be very glad to make any appropriate acknowledgment and, if desired, to submit any such letters in advance of publication.

I am sure this will receive your consideration and if the suggestion is presumptious, please excuse it on the basis of my ignorance in such matters.

I enclose a mailing typical of those we have been sending and will await with much interest your reply.

Very truly yours

"Pictures and Conversation"

DECLARED Alice in Wonderland: "What is the use of a book without pictures and conversation?"

In our last letter we dealt with the role that endowments play in the development of a college and the opportunity which many individuals have to contribute to the increase of endowments by making provision in their wills. The general considerations underlying an appeal for such bequests are important, but they are not the considerations which commonly move people to action. It is human nature to follow the dictates of one's heart as well as of one's mind, and to concentrate interest in a particular college rather than in colleges in general. So in this letter we shall try to fill in what Alice called the "pictures and conversation" and tell you something about Westminster.

We shall begin by pointing out that Westminster is an old college. It has been in continuous operation as a degree-granting institution since 1851. A college is what it is, perhaps more than any other institution, because of intangible assets; and these do not spring full-grown from the head of Jove. If a college stands for fine things, it evolves over the course of many years a character of its own. Its distinctive character is based upon foundations securely laid. Westminster has stood the test of time and has proved itself a house not built upon foundations of sand.

THE strength of a small college lies in its faculty. This follows from the fact that the life and program of such a college are built around personal relationships. The imprint of character has been made on Westminster by a long succession of able and dedicated teachers. To an alumnus of Westminster, one has only to mention the name of Rice, colleges and universities; 15% are doctors; 15% are ministers; 15% are lawyers; 16% have gone into miscellaneous fields of public service. There is no way of measuring the standing of these men in comparison with products of other colleges. But an extensive survey reported in the July 1951 issue of Scientific American magazine found that among all the colleges and universities in the nation, Westminster ranked 39th in output of research scientists in proportion to the number of graduates over a given period. This is the record of a college which has always accented the humanities.

WESTMINSTER has from the outset been a men's college. It is the only one of its type west of the Mississippi. The graduate of the men's college will testify that there is a spirit and atmosphere, a sense of camaraderie, peculiar to the men's campus which makes for an intense and distinctive college experience. The colleges for men on the Eastern seaboard act as a magnet for students from all parts of the country. Westminster is one of eighteen such colleges in the country. It offers young men in this Midwest area the type of college experience represented by such institutions as Williams, Amherst, Dartmouth, Bowdoin and Davidson in the East.

Like these colleges, Westminster is located in a small and friendly town, an ideal setting for a residential college. Fulton has the added advantage of being situated midway er is a church-related college. This an view of life is the unifying and its program, the touchstone of all that it seeks to accomplish. The concern of the College is with ends as well as with means, with men as well as with mechanics. Its chapel with its regular services and its faculty director is central on the campus. Courses in Bible content are required of all students, as are courses in foreign language. Faculty members are chosen with a view to their concern for the basic purpose of the College. Westminster operates within a religious context.

MANY people know of Westminster in connection with Winston Churchill's Iron Curtain address in March of 1946 and with the Green Foundation lectures. These events have not in themselves added to the stature of Westminster but they have focused public attention upon it. This is a college which from its early beginnings has not been found wanting. Its future beckons. There is a treasure here, but it is a treasure which resides in earthen vessels. The earthen vessels are the material resources whose strengthening will secure the College against the buffetings of time. It is our conviction that there are those who if properly apprized of the need and opportunity, will give earnest and prayerful consideration in the composition of their wills to the cause which this college represents.

Accent on Giving

IN ONE of his books, Dr. Fosdick relates an incident which occurred during the first world war.

A young French soldier lay on a hospital cot. The surgeon who had just amputated his arm looked at him sympathetically. "I am very sorry," he said, "that you had to lose your arm." The soldier opened his eyes and protested, "I did not lose my arm; I gave it."

The accent on giving was what made this soldier's experience different, was what made it, in his case, sublime.

The accent on giving is what makes an enterprise like Westminster unique, is what supplies the essentials of greatness in terms of quality and spiritual vitality.

Consider for a moment what motivates people in their giving to Westminster.

In the case of an alumnus it may be sentiment. The College has meant something to such a one in a personal way and he wishes to insure that others may have a like opportunity.

To another, the motivation may be religious. He recognizes that there is a special responsibility of the churchman toward the College, and in a day in which "the world is too much with us" he echoes the words of St. Augustine: "Who can teach me, save he that enlighteneth my heart?"

Others may be impelled by the conviction that the dollar one gives to Westminster will be more productive educationally than at any other type of college. True, Westminster lacks the glamor of the large institution and of the university where specialization and spectacular research claim public attention. But such a donor is convinced that mass production is a standard for industry, not for education. He feels that the learning process is most fruitfully pursued in an intimate relationship and is most effectively directed toward the foundations rather than toward the gadgets of learning. He perceives in the emphasis on liberal studies the primary aim of education, namely, the liberating and the disciplining of men's minds.

Still others may give because they believe in independent enterprise. They acknowledge that independent enterprise in education is a primary responsibility of independent enterprise in business and industry — in fact that both are indispensable and indivisible ingredients of a capitalistic order.

Finally, there are many who are moved by an appreciation of the fact that colleges like Westminster have proved a foundation stone in the structure of the nation's freedom, and are today strong guarantees against a monolithic, state-supported system of higher education and thereby against a monolithic state.

NOW IT IS to be noted that none of these objectives — sentimental, religious, educational, maintenance of independent enterprise, guaranteeing of traditional freedom, in the senses indicated — permit of realization except through the act of free-will giving. You cannot legislate them; you cannot establish them by ukase; taxation cannot conjure them into being.

These are in essence spiritual objectives and as such they depend for their realization upon the inclination of men's hearts.

That is the source of the vitality of a college like Westminster; that is the key to its significance; that is why it partakes of the quality of spirit of the soldier who protested, "I did not lose my arm; I gave it."

When you make your will, you make a law, respected and upheld by the courts of the land. That is the only kind of legislation to which Westminster looks for the strengthening of its material ramparts.

When you write that law, may you consider Westminster College in terms of the prayer of David: "Therefore, now let it please thee to bless the house of thy servant that it may continue forever before thee . . . and with thy blessing let the house of thy servant be blessed forever."

Forms for Bequests

The following form may be used for an unrestricted bequest:

"I give, devise and bequeath to the Board of Trustees of Westminster College, a corporation, located at Fulton, Missouri, the sum of $.....(or property herein described), to be a part of its Endowment Fund and to be used for the benefit of said institution as its Board of Trustees deem advisable."

If it is desired to create a Memorial Fund in the name of the donor or in the name of someone else, the following form is suggested:

"I give, devise and bequeath to the Board of Trustees of Westminster College, a corporation, located at Fulton, Missouri, the sum of $.....(or property herein described), the same to be known and designated as 'The_____(insert name)_____Memorial Fund.' The income therefrom shall be used as the Board of Trustees may determine, to promote the work of the College. The said Board of Trustees shall have the right to expend the whole or any part of the principal of said sum in the erection of a building or in connection with some definite project, provided that there is thereby established a suitable memorial in the name of_____(insert name)_____."

Van Dyke, Russ

Ed:

Russ Van Dyke just called. The farm documentary made Page 1 of the Des Moines Register with single-column head:IOWANS ON FARM SHOW BY MURROW. The lead says, "It was a good show...fine reflection of attitudes of farmers." Piece calls footage of three farmers discussing farm problem a "priceless documentary" on how farmers think, and how they differ. Register story goes on to say there is evidence of showman's approach and that auction scene was "over-dramatized". But that anyone who saw the whole show got fairly well-rounded picture of the farm problem today. Van Dyke said his station received no calls. The Register story was written by ~~[illegible]~~ editor Lauren Soth, who usually handles editoral page. Van Dyke is teletyping highlights of story.

Van Dyke also wants to know if possible to get print of show for re-run. If he cannot have ~~[illegible]~~ print of whole show, he is especially interested in footage in which the three farmers ~~[illegible]~~ debate situation.

Dear Mr. Murrow:

I am disappointed and astonished that you would lend your name to television show of last night, allegedly dedicated to the War Correspondents who lost their lives, but which turned out to be more of a glorification of the USO "warriors" whom you know, as well as I do, undeserving of such recognition.

In three years of war in North Africa and in Burma and China I knew a lot of War Correspondents. Some of them got killed. They were fine men. Lots of them were brave to the point of being foolish. And any honor that can be accorded these men, those living and those dead, I'm all for it.

The Ernie Pyle sequence was excellent, even if historically cockeyed. The actor looked and acted a great deal like Ernie Pyle whom I knew in North Africa, even talked like him. But Mr. Robert Sherwood must have known that Ernie Pyle left Paris in August 1944....long before the blood-letting in the Heurtgen Forest and at Bastogne. As one who spent almost the entire war...before and after we got into it...in Europe I know you knew this. And I wish you'd looked at the script....so that bad bobble would not have marred an otherwise fine sequence.

It's not that I have any grudge against the USO troupers who did their bit by keeping a death-grip on their movie contracts and darting out between pictures to make one-night stands for the troops. Maybe they really were the mainbrace of that mysterious thing called morale. Though that's debatable. It's just that I know there were such fine motion picture people as Jimmy Stewart, Clark Gable, Wayne Morris, Melvin Douglas and even stuttering Roscoe Ates who did a bang up job in uniform and got nothing except what the rest of us got...shot at and whatever came over the pay table on the last day of each month.

It looks to me like the Hollywood crowd took your and John Daley's show away from you-all....and the Overseas Press Club... and ran it to suit their Hollywood bosses. I think this a great pity.

On Thursday, July 28, 1955, the Voisin was compelled to close its doors because of the demolishment of 375 Park Avenue. It was with great sadness that the final beverage and food service was completed because of the pleasant years which the Voisin and its patrons enjoyed at that address.

The Voisin intends to continue in the same fashion and hopes upon its re-opening to have the pleasure of serving its old friends and greeting new friends. The opening of the Voisin is contemplated for September 15, 1955, at the Beekman Hotel, 63rd Street and Park Avenue. When we have a definite opening date, we will be pleased to notify you.

As you will understand, moving the Voisin, establishing and decorating new premises, is a problem which involves a great expense. We have always appreciated our patrons' prompt payment of their statements. We will be sincerely thankful if you would be kind enough at this time to make your usual prompt remittance.

We wish you a most pleasant summer and we hope to present to you a new Voisin in every way comparable to the old Voisin and, if possible, to exceed it in service, beverages, foods and friendliness.

Mr. Sig Mickelson

Dear Mr. Mickelson:

Last November I wrote to you and Mr. Murrow suggesting a program about Alfred Nobel with subsequent shorts on the Nobel prizewinners, and even though you were at the time intrigued with the idea, you did not see your way clear to explore the possibilities of such a program further. As you can see from the enclosed clipping, Hallmark Hall of Fame opened their season with an hour's program on the life of Alfred Nobel.

I still think that the idea as such - to portray Nobel prizewinners - is as acute as ever, and having in the meantime been in correspondence with a number of winners of the Nobel prize I have found that their response is favorable, and they would like to see a program of this type produced in coordination with the Nobel Foundation in Sweden.

I also have in mind another program of quite a different nature which would be much easier to commercialize, and which I believe would do more to combat crime than any program now being shown. This series would depict actual crimes which have been committed. The emphasis, however, would be centered neither on the criminal nor on the law enforcement agencies, but on the consequences of the criminal act as they affected related individuals or families.

Another feature of the program would be the award of a prize to each family selected to aid them in overcoming the difficulties which had changed their lives.

The type of situation I have in mind is, for instance, where the breadwinner of a family is attacked and badly injured or killed, and as a result the family loses its home, or the children are forced to discontinue their education, or a particularly gifted child is compelled to abandon the study of music or dancing.

over:

The educational value of such a program would also be great. The present generation is more and more enticed to perform acts of horror for the sake of the moment of thrill, however brief that moment may be. Current anti-crime shorts do not act as a deterrent, as the foremost impression left by the showing of the chase and final apprehension of a criminal is one of excitement, which is not offset by the realization of the misery and pain resulting from these acts.

I also believe the general feeling of the viewing public would go out to the victimized families, and that a program of this nature would achieve a high rating.

In addition to the foregoing I have another idea for the renting of film-television programs to European non-stop movie houses, and for a closed-circuit program in this country.

I have to fly to Geneva for about eight days, but hope you will afford me an opportunity of discussing these matters with you upon my return, which will not be later than September 22nd.

I notice that since our last exchange of correspondence you have become Vice-President, and take this opportunity to extend my congratulations.

Sincerely,

B von Halle.

Dear Ed,

Thanks so much for your good letter of Nov. 2. The only point I would make with regard to your statement would be centered around your sentence in which you say "considered by whom". It was extreme pressure by a small group on a reluctant and weakened man who had made a grudging concession and then repented. Some day more of the truth will find its way to light but there need be no haste.

The part of your letter which interests me most is your suggestion of a "farmer-to-to- farmer" visit on a "neighbor-to-neighbor" basis. We are not too far out of your way when you drive up on week ends and we would love to see both you and Mrs. Murrow. Yes, you had better bring Mrs. Murrow along because as you doubtless know, the ladies everywhere are just wild about you. In this neighborhood there is what you might call a "Murrow admiration society".

Dear Mr. Wallace:

Thank you for your generous comment on the program about the Vice Presidency.

I am inclined to agree with you that my wording of the statement about your being dropped in 1944 might have been more carefully phrased. What I said was: "But by 1944 it was obvious that Wallace was considered too much of a liability for re-nomination." I might better have said, considered by whom. I know it was Hannegan and Flynn who persuaded Mr. Roosevelt of it, but since Mr. Roosevelt was persuaded, my statement is at least correct, if not complete. And I did not say that you were a liability.

I am looking forward to a farmer-to-farmer and neighbor-to-neighbor visit at your place one of these days.

Dear Mr. Murrow,

Just a note to say how much I enjoy all your Television programs. Your recent show on the Vice Presidency was a masterpiece.

I must very strongly dissent, however, when you say that I was dropped in 1944 because I was a liability. A Gallup poll of July 18, 1944 among the rank and file of the Democratic voters ov over the entire country, indicated as follows:

Wallace 65%, Barkley 17 %, Rayburn 5 %, Byrd 4 %, Byrnes 3 %, Douglas 2 %, Truman 2 %, Stettinius 2 %.

Confidentially I may say that Mark Etheridge wrote Roosevelt on July 25, 1944 as follows:

"I believe that if you had given Wallace the chance of even a free convention and allowed him to be nominated as he would have been, as the symbol of liberalism against which the conservatives directed their fight-since they would not fight you- you would have picked up even bigger majorities in the South than you will with Truman. I believe you have lost strength in the North, ~~I believe you have lost strength in the north~~ I think you ought to know, too, that in spite of what Mr. Hannegan and others may tell you, there are a great many of us who feel the same way. "

Actually the whole thing was worked out by Hannegan and Flynn who were steadily putting pressure on a weakened Roosevelt. This can easily be documented. Sincerely yours,

H A Wallace

"THE FORWARD LOOK"

Address to be delivered

by

WALTER WANGER

at the

NATIONAL REGIONAL CONFERENCE

of the

NATIONAL PROBATION and PAROLE ASSOCIATION in

St. Paul, Minn.
June 19, 1955.

- THE FORWARD LOOK -

I am most grateful for the opportunity of addressing this distinguished gathering of American citizens, who come from all parts of our great land to share and discuss their deep concern for the regeneration and the future of their unfortunate fellow citizens. They are 'unfortunate' because, according to the statistics of the FBI, only 15% of the law breakers are ever apprehended, let alone sentenced, so this is indeed an exclusive group of misfortunates who had a seven-to-one chance to beat the Law, and lost. Your sympathy for this group is, indeed, a fine and decent thing, and your concern for those society has mobilised itself against is to be commended. Yet there are still 85% of the country's law breakers mixing with us daily but not feeling any of the prejudice that the 15% paying their debt to society must face.

In my lifetime I've seen some strange mobilization of public opinion. I remember the Hun of World War I, when German Opera and Hamburger Steaks were taboo. I remember the way we rebuilt Germany after the war, only to again hate the Nazi and his cruel philosophy, that has left such a mark on all of us. And, once again, we're all admiration for the Germans' industry and accomplishments, and are helping them become the masters of the New United Europe. As early as 1949 I heard a great French banker, who had been a German prisoner-of-war, saying: "After all, we must do business with them." The same see-saw of public and private opinion has taken place vis-a-vis the Russians, the Japanese and the Italians.

But, as there did not seem to be any "business" involved concerning the men or women who are incarcerated in our penal institutions, the social attitude has never varied...: "They broke the Law". "They're no good." "Let them stew." "I can't take a chance." "Keep them away from me."

I hope to prove tonight that we Americans can no longer afford this hypocritical and un-Christianlike attitude towards our social problems, and succeed domestically or internationally as a respected nation. The Dignity of Man is business today, even more so than the regeneration of our enemies, and is the concern of many people besides your goodselves.

At the outset, I must say I am full of humility in taking your time tonight because of my very superficial knowledge of a field in which you are all expert. You have been devoting your lives to this problem of penology, and I only came in contact with it a few years ago. I must admit, however, I earned my invitation to be here to address you tonight "the hard way".

Nothing I have ever encountered has interested me more than this penal problem, and, in my opinion, no problem in the nation requires more immediate assistance because of its implications and its evil potential to our entire social system. To show you how ignorant I was regarding the entire problem, I was startled to discover so great a number of splendid men and women who had been giving their lives to the solution of this horrible problem (and with what fortitude and patience they labored on, expecting little but always hoping for a really new day and a better understanding.)

It has been my good fortune to meet and work with such men as Attorney General Pat Brown, of California, Austin McCormick, James V. Bennett, Richard McGee, Marcel Frym, Kenyon Scudder, and many more from coast to coast in connection with the making of my film, RIOT IN CELL BLOCK 11. Without the co-operation of these men, the picture could never have been made, and I am most grateful to them for the assistance they gave me, but even more for the opportunity of knowing them and the education they gave me.

My second discovery was quite a blow, as, I must admit, I thought I was a fairly well-read individual. And that was to discover a complete and enthralling literature on the entire field of penology, and to find how honest and forthright the official spokesmen of the field were in their brutal criticism of this mediæval system of degrading men and women that we tolerate so complacently. I was amazed to find, in what I was told was the authorized textbook for Custodians, "New Horizons in Criminology", by Barnes and Teeters, a chapter called: "The Futility and Cruelty of the Modern Prison."

I was enormously impressed by the honesty of the statement issued by the American Prison Association on "A Statement Concerning Prison Riots and Disturbances." I was amazed to find the entire matter was brilliantly exposed by Bernard Shaw, as early as 1927, in his "Crude Criminology", which I had never heard of before, and I have since then found a flood of great writing on the subject.

Only a few weeks ago, I read a hair-raising statement in the Saturday Evening Post, by one of your Directors, Sanford Bates, called, "The Trouble with Prisons is Politics", and an article in Collier's, "Jail is no Place for Children in Trouble", by Ruth and Edward Brecker -- both most constructive articles.

I know of the fine work that is being done by your Organization in the field of Probation and Parole; such as your survey of the penal system requested by Governor Christian Herter, also your campaign for adequate probation service in all of our Courts dealing with offenders, urged by your Advisory Council of Judges. As a matter of fact, there are outstanding groups all over the country -- Wisconsin, New York, Illinois, California, and many I don't know about: the many groups struggling with insufficient funds, and many understaffed, all bravely going on, knowing that the conditions are better than they were, and that some few people are, at long last, acquiring a new attitude toward their work. But, with the whole world watching us, we can no longer accept the excuses.....: "After all, Rome wasn't built in a day", and "You can't expect to move quickly", and, "We haven't got the funds", and, "We have got to consider the coming elections", and, "the newspapers", and, "Who wants to hire an ex-con, anyway ?", and, "Don't forget at the Capitol we have no lobby for prisoners."

I believe the time for this kind of thinking is past and results are necessary.

My indoctrination in this jungle of human disgrace has brought me in contact with many experts inside and outside these institutions. When we were filming at Folsom, I met one of the greatest authorities on practical penology in the country. He was the Associate Warden, had been at Folsom for forty years. In the Folsom riots in the 'twenties, he was left for dead. This man had no bitterness for the inmates, but compassion and understanding. There was no part of the prison he couldn't go through, unarmed. The men worshipped him because he was not hypocritical, or power drunk, but truly a human being. One felt better for seeing and talking to him. And many times he said to me: "I wish I could get my hands on some of these judges who have never seen this place, and let them take five or ten years, or just solitary for a week. Over 40% of the men here in Folsom are 'paper-hangers', or so-called forgers, which can be a bouncing check." This was no reason to ruin a man's life according to Ryan, or to overcrowd the prison.

The doctor in charge of the hospital was another wonderful individual, who healed not only the inmates, but the whole countryside. He unburdened himself to me on the stupidities of these institutions' plans for helping men. He himself took chances. For instance, his X-Ray Technician was in on a murder charge and, for the first time in his life, this man had been given an opportunity to do something that satisfied him. He was the most grateful and devoted supporter of the little doctor.

I could go on with stories like this, but you know them as well as I do. Unfortunately they don't solve the problem. Although many wonderful individuals are dedicating themselves, they cannot overcome the politics and the corruption in the penal situation today from coast to coast. Something more is needed. With the exception of Chino and Seagoville, I have never seen an institution that wasn't a complete contradiction to everything that our Government and the United Nations have to say in respect of the dignity of man. Outside of supplying the motion pictures and newspapers with an exciting subject, "The Rock", or Alcatraz, is about as stupid a waste of the taxpayers' money as I've ever seen. Here is an entire island community serviced to maintain about 275 men -- Many so-called most violent individuals in the country (the ones who have been caught) were spending their time painting portraits and landscapes the day I was there. I cannot imagine a better way not to prepare men for release than by sending them to rot in Alcatraz. I know that the authorities would like to see Alcatraz eliminated, but there's some good, unhealthy, political reason why it's still in operation.

San Quentin, nearby, is another hot-spot, overcrowded to a boiling point, a constant worry to the Prison Authority. I was again impressed there by the remarkable furniture showroom and factory operated by the inmates - a plant that could be greatly augmented except for the fact that the Unions, who fight so hard for the rights of men to work, have been the main stumbling block in not allowing penal institutions to train men properly in industry so that they could return when released to join a union and be useful citizens. This discrimination is another flagrant example of our hypocrisy. I personally don't believe in prisons and jails as they are currently mismanaged, in most cases, in the United States, but do believe, under an efficient administration, institutions could be self-supporting and properly administered by trained personnel.

Any number of prison authorities have told me, at their first opportunity, that Custodial work was not the work of the police, and how right they are ! Certainly we all know that, until politicians are eliminated, this penal problem will never be solved properly.

From the moment of arrest, the citizen who is apprehended is abused and degraded. Everything possible is done to automatically convince him that, through the magic of the Law, he is no longer a man with rights, but a law breaker, con-man, fraud, bum, and he'd better keep in his place if he knows what's good for him, and remember he's just a number from now on. He's handled by people unfit for the work who are victims of "stir" themselves, sentenced to forty years until they get their pension, and subject to all the unhealthy atmosphere the inmate is and, very often, not as able to cope with it because they are not as clever as the inmates. The inmates only committed one error and they have a chance of getting out. Many of the Custodial Force are there because they can't get any other employment. Even the professional visitors of church groups, charities, and well-meaning committees, have become hardened to the smell and customs of jails and prisons, and carry little influence with men or authorities.

You know, only too well, the instances of the frustration, confusion, mismanagement, graft, incompetence, cruelty, idleness and misery that goes on. We forget the thin line between ourselves outside the Law, and ourselves a captive of the Law. It is the same man or woman - being worsened by stupid treatment.

The system is crueler today than it's ever been. In the days when the Prisoner of Chillon was tossed in the dungeon, he was not cut off from radio, television, daily papers, aeroplanes, motorcars, music and books, and the freedom that we cherish in this land.

To me, nothing is more humiliating than when I receive letters from the men about to be released, asking for assistance in getting work, and I am helpless to do anything about it.

When I was in Detroit with my film, and showed it to the Michigan authorities, I found out that, after two years of their dreadful riots at Jackson, little had been done to change the running of their terrible prison, but that the Committees were still working on reports. And yet, in the same State, the General Motors Hydramatic Plant had been completely destroyed by fire, but, due to the technological efficiency and the non-political but free enterprise approach, the General Motors plant was rebuilt in 58 days instead of 3 years. Here, in the same State, is the difference in approach !

I believe we have in this great land of ours, not only the way of handling our social responsibilities, but a great new desire to do it. First of all, this penal problem is only a facet of the crime and corruption of this country, and we are all on probation - all of us - the entire nation.

The cost of crime and corruption runs into billions of dollars, and a large amount of it must be paid by insurance companies and big businesses who are the victims of crime. Beyond the material losses, however, is the continual weakening of the nation's ethics and morals due to the success of crime and corruption, so that it becomes a two-fold urgency for those great industries that depend on the health and welfare of the nation, to eliminate, not only as a fine undertaking, but in self interest, this malignant social cancer.

Not only are the business and insurance companies vulnerable to this onslaught of crime and corruption, but every American family is vulnerable as well. The Capone philosophy has been accepted by far too many in this country in all walks of life. Too often, in circles that should not be using these terms, you will hear of "the fix", "the angle", "the racket", "the edge", "the con", and you will hear more of it each year, until we really face the whole problem in a forthright manner. Why any of us in our right minds are surprised by the growing youth delinquency in this country baffles me. I'm surprised it's not more widespread in view of the adult delinquency that is evident each day.

How fortunate we are to have, as Secretary of State, a humanitarian like Mr. Dulles, who frankly said, in his book, "War or Peace" : -

> "As a nation, although still religious, we have lost the connection between our religious faith and our practices. We keep religion and practices in separate compartments. We no longer see that our faith is relevant to modern conditions.
> "We are in a dilemma, and it is a grave dilemma. Because we have not resolved it, our spiritual influence in the world has waned and we are tied down to the area that we can reach and influence by material things - guns and goods.

"Our greatest need is to regain confidence in our spiritual heritage. Religious belief in the moral nature and possibilities of man is, and must be, relevant to every kind of society. Great material power is dangerous in an age of materialism. It is not dangerous in an age of spiritualism."

The Secretary of State is correct. And the answer to our problems domestically and internationally would be in a rennaissance of the American heritage and again to develop an age of spiritualism. We have become involved in an international problem because, each year, we are training men and women for the underworlds in these institutions, and forcing them to drift to "the mob" on release. The international repercussions mentioned by Secretary Dulles are seconded by Carlos P. Romulo, the Philippino Statesman, who says:

"There are millions of the uncommitted in Asia who will side with democracy if America can gain their faith once more. - These are the basic elements of that crusade: Cut the navel cord that joins the subversive groups to the masses and the subversives cannot exist. Clean out graft and incompetence from the government -- the filth Communism feeds upon -- and Communism cannot survive."

All over the world they are looking to us and wondering what has happened to our crusade. The British, the French, the Germans, the Italians, the Scandinavians, and all the rest, are conscious of our vacuum in this area. They don't expect us to be perfect, but they want to see us approach our social problems with the same imagination and resources we approach our material and scientific problems.

We have no Iron Curtain like the Russians, so, through our great mass media and free press, all our social problems are exposed all over the world, as well as our other activities, and when they read of new hotels each month in Las Vegas, new race tracks, the money that is being spent on luxuries, and then hear that we haven't enough money to pay teachers and build schools, hospitals, look after our mental cases, what can they think - except, "If they can't do anything for themselves, what can they do for us ?" The whole world is waking up. Surely the Bundong Conference proved this. Let's revive the spirit of Washington, Jefferson, Hamilton, the Adamses, Franklin, Monroe and Madison, and the rest of the Founding Fathers that blessed this country with courage and integrity, and who seem to have been forgotten for the moment !

Our material and scientific life today makes us feel as if are in the year 2000. Our spiritual and social behavior resembles The Dark Ages. We have the highest living standard in the world. A great section of the public enjoying an everyday existence a hundred years ahead of our parents in material and technological advances. The graces of living at a new height never known to man, the knowledge, automatically at our disposal, of international affairs, due to radio and television that heads of governments didn't have twenty years ago. The opportunities for the entire population to travel all over the world, due to the aeroplane.

The American in 1955 is far removed from the American of 1920, 1930, or even 1945. On all sides there's been complete revolution -- except in social responsibility.

The great advances made by industry in the last ten years since V.E. Day are hard to comprehend. Each month, 'Fortune Magazine', for example, with its magic tales of one gigantic accomplishment after another, staggers the imagination: page after page of developments and instruments that, in three hours, do what it took the staff of a great organization three months to do. Equipment so extraordinary, in operation already, that it is completely incomprehensible to an old Edwardian like myself. The miracle of television has opened up an entirely new universe. Motion pictures, radio, the automobile, the aeroplane, have bred a new race of people. We must adapt ourselves to the importance of the scientific and material advancements and apply their energies to a speed-up in the social system. Delinquency, education, mental hospitals, health in general, the penal problem, all a part of mass education and conditioning, all reflect on our ability whether we can keep abreast of the times, or just stand by.

The most amazing development in the United States in the last decade has been how Big Business has come of age with its international expansion, learning how to deal with other governments and other peoples all over the world. There is nothing isolationist about Big Business today. They have become expert diplomats. They have even become Showmen, with their entrance as patrons of television and radio, so they are gaining experience all the way from diplomatic to social problems and even to the Arts. This has had a tremendous effect on the majority of the great concerns, who, I say, must become our allies.....I say this is our opportunity to ally ourselves with organizations who have the know-how we require.

I was so impressed recently, when, in connection with the film I am preparing, I was looking at some of the industrial film made by Ingersoll Rand, International Harvester, and Morrison-Knudsen. Although I produced THE ARABIAN NIGHTS, never have I dreamed of such imaginative, heroic conquests as these great companies are achieving all over the world every day. The imagination shown by these great companies in many, many areas is a real inspiration to those of us who are so content to be patient. The building of the five-hundred-million dollar Alcan Kitimat Aluminum Development up in the Canadian Rockies, four hundred miles from civilization, four years of engineering magic, logistics genius, changing the course of a river, tunnelling ten miles through the mountains, building a new civilization, having every social problem imaginable thrown in their lap, using every modern device to beat the schedule. Dam building in Afghanistan by our men, changing desert to fertile valley, and, after a year of our indoctrination, the Afghan people running all the equipment and doing the engineering themselves. This sort of achievement is being repeated all over the globe by our industry.

In this kind of world, can we stand by and be satisfied with lesser achievements in the social "deserts" and mental "rockies" " I not only say no, but I say we must enlist the same brains and brawn to research and probe and solve our problems, which are much less difficult than those they have solved.

For example, my friend, Doctor Frym, working with the Attorney General's office in California, has evolved a plan called, "Character Underwriters". This is a practical plan to protect the inmate on release, and to protect the business that hires this individual. It is certainly in the self interest of insurance companies and other business to explore this plan, and, certainly, without their funds and resources, nothing will be accomplished.

I believe most sincerely that Big Business is ready to join you in achieving your goals, and I believe that you need them. Harry A. Bullis, Chairman of the Board of General Mills, Incorporated, at the 43rd Annual Chamber of Commerce Meeting, early last month spoke in Washington of the social responsibilities of the businessman. I wish you would send for his complete speech and read it.

> "But how," asked Mr. Bullis, "can I develop a project with social consciousness ? I am taking the liberty of suggesting a few opportunities that are before the door of everyone.
> "1. Education. This is the number one social problem of our day. Inadequate school plants. Lack of trained teachers. Unsatisfactory teaching curricular. Lack of funds for liberal arts colleges. The need for scholarships. No candidates for school board jobs. There are innumerable opportunities here."

And Mr. Bullis goes on with other excellent suggestions, ending up with the statement that: -

"It has been said that the future belongs to them that prepare for it. Just so, as business faces up to its social responsibilities, will society stand up for business. In this combination rests the destiny of our expanding economy and an America with increasing opportunity and happiness for all."

I couldn't agree with you more, Mr. Bullis. This is all one, great intermingled problem. I urge, therefore, that you Ladies and Gentlemen appoint a commission similar to the great Herbert Hoover Commission for the Reorganization of the Executive Branch of the Government -- a Commission for Reorganization of Social Responsibilities, and enlist the great leaders of American business to support an overall programme to operate and manage the social institutions of this nation which require help.

There is no better example of what I believe possible than the amazing "Forward Look Programme" of the Chrysler Corporation. Starting in 1951, they planned a complete reorganization of their business, and this year they have turned their company from an ailing institution to the greatest prosperity in their history.

What the social conscience of the nation needs is a Forward Look. It can only be done by our enlisting dedicated Americans that will apply their research machinery, technological skill and genius, to the task of making this nation so strong at home that our allies and enemies will once again have faith in the American accomplishment.

Wherever you look, you'll find Big Business expressing its desire to become involved in this Forward Look. Even since I've begun to prepare this talk, things have been moving so rapidly that events have caught up with my remarks. The Los Angeles Times - not a radical dreamer's newspaper - has had two leading editorials in one week that are more than heartwarming. One, entitled "The Great Need for Basic Research", urging industry to continue to expand its efforts to help medical institutions, medical schools, and basic research regarding education in general.

Quoting The Hoover Report, "Research has become Big Business.'" "... An increasing tendency on the part of Big Business organizations to invest in basic research is to be commended", says the editorial.

The second editorial, called "And Not For Philanthropy", starts out:

"'Financial aid to education is a new phase of corporation management.' That is the first sentence in a booklet gotten out by the Council for Financial Aid to Education."

Further on, it says:

"The Council's booklet suggests that there is a new, almost revolutionary attitude among corporations; that it is being accepted by corporations of all sizes; that aid to education has become a studied policy of business, not an impulse. 'Financial aid to education is not solely public relations - nor solely industrial, consumer, or community relations. It is an investment in the future, not a philanthropy.... What happens to American education will eventually happen to America.'" This, from the Los Angeles Times.

What could be more effective than to have the great forces that have achieved material world leadership accept the task of reorganizing our social problems and achieving moral leadership ? Surely, nothing would be more impressive and convincing to our allies and enemies, than to see us assuming this task, this very week, at the time that the United Nations is meeting in San Francisco !

Moral leadership does not imply perfection, nor does it overlook the frailty of man, but to see the unlimited strength of America's imaginative, industrial and educational leaders joining together would be a practical inspiration to the world.

Heavy industry, through Science, has expanded its products, and we find: U.S. Steel making our prefabricated houses, our knives and our forks; General Motors not only produces motor cars, but frigidaires; Dupont has turned from munitions in order to make clothes, nylon stockings, plastics and heaven knows what else.

Big industry has filled the magazines and newspapers with advertisements telling us how to live in a better manner.

What I am asking you, is to invite the big industries to go just one step further and see that a better living is extended, now that they have indicated that they are more than willing to accept your problems. Let them join you in a plan to research, develop, design and produce a forthright, modern, approach to our social and spiritual problems in the interest of eliminating crime, corruption and hypocrisy, which, surely, would prove to ourselves, and the rest of the world, we are, at long last, coming of age.

I will probably surprise you by saying that I've come to the conclusion that this is the only way of achieving the goals that you so desperately desire, this is the one way of going from the inadequate, unfinanced methods of today, and endless committee meetings, in the modern demands of your own extensive research. You, through your sacrifice and devotion, have gathered all the facts concerning probation and parole. You know the story of the prisons and the whole penal problem from arrest to release. You must admit, with your wealth of research material, experience, at their disposal, the great industries of this nation could quickly prepare the blueprints, commence the re-tooling and the rebuilding of a new social efficiency that would equal their great material efficiency.

Let us look at the current penal problem. The Federal and State Institutions have a population of about 250,000 inmates. This is not so fabulous. Divided by 48 States, about 5,000 inmates per State. I am not touching on the city jails and sheriffs' domain, because that mess will automatically be cured if the other two divisions are intelligently dealt with, because no graft or political set up will be able to survive a real reorganization. Now, if these 5,000 men and women in each State were properly classified by intelligent methods used in industry, many would be sent to mental institutions, many to hospitals, others released on probation, others to camps, training schools, where they would be regenerated and adjusted to a proper place in society. Locking up the alcoholics, the homosexuals and the dope addicts, most everyone admits, is ridiculous. A small percentage of incorrigible and hardened law breakers would be held incarcerated.

But, I'm not going to prophesy what the research and ability of the great American industrialists, who have solved far more difficult problems throughout the world, are going to bring forth as their solution.

But I say, with deepest respect for the work that you have done, that this is not a work that can be accomplished by devotion, a great heart, and fortitude alone.

This is Big Business, the business of the Dignity of Man, and no undertaking could be more of a challenge to the great industries of this country than our current social problems.

Thank you very much, Ladies and Gentlemen.

Dear Mr. Murrow:

I greatly enjoyed our chat the other afternoon and shall remember the various points in my talk at Washington. I shall advise you of progress as it develops.

In connection with our mention of "Automation," I enclose — on shelf John Diebold's book for your perusal. The Guaranteed Annual Wage issue seems to be approaching a fever pitch.

When I get back I will give you a call. Perhaps you might like to have a glass with Mr. Diebold at which time we could further discuss the merit of this new technology as possible material for your program.

I am sorry San Francisco is so far away but as you succinctly remarked, "We don't have to pay for it."

Dear Ed,

As I hope you gathered from my cable yesterday, the Home Office has finally granted me permission to be active in the world of television in Britain, and thus my connection with Sidney is quite official. I would however be grateful if you would keep this information mostly to yourself, since I cannot see that there is anything to be gained from personal publicity.

I am writing to-day to ask you on my behalf and Sidney's, whether you think it would be possible to permit an English observer to spend two or three months in New York concentrating his attention on the planning and production of the television projects with which you are personally associated. The chap in question will be known to you -- he is Harry Watt, one of the best film documentarians in England, with notable successes in the field of actuality; in recent years he has written and directed several highly successful pictures for Ealing.

Harry is a very close friend of Sidney and he is about to join our television operation.

It has occurred to both of us that he could gain immeasurably if he were permitted to sit on the sidelines watching the activities of your several units. He is, as you know, a very personable and likeable fellow, and gets along admirably with people of all descriptions.

He is new to television and we feel that he could learn a lot about the terrible discipline of television production and deadlines by exposure to American methods, especially yours.

Mr. Ed Murrow 19.1.55

In my personal opinion, our television operation will not reach the transmission stage for about another year, and if this be true, Harry would not actually be putting programmes together for us, even in a preparatory state, until early this fall. There is thus ample time now for him to make the trip to the States and to prepare himself for the very hard work ahead.

Could you let me know, as soon as possible, whether you would have any objection to Harry Watt's continuing presence for a period of some months in and about your headquarters. We would make all the necessary arrangements for his travel and housing in New York.

If the project is acceptable to you, I shall certainly envy Harry, because there could be no better training for anybody, whether he be a new hand or an old hand in this field -- than in the unique field you represent in American television. Somehow, this sort of cross-pollination of the cultures is what we have all been driving at for years, and I do hope that our proposal can be favourably regarded.

With all best wishes and warm regards to Janet and Casey.

Sincerely,

Dear Ed,

John Forbes, the bard of the Quilcene slide has just informed me that you and family, together with Paul Coie, will be here for a fishing trip on 9-10-and 11 of July.

Mrs. W. and I are leaving for California tomorrow, (June 23) where our daughter is at present, and our son will fly down to join us on the 28th. However, we are revising all plans to be back here on the 9th of July for the following damned good reasons.

High on the dunes overlooking the fishing banks we have just)or almost) completed a new summer home where we will spend the remainder of the summer. And we would like to have you, and the Coies spit on our sand dune and tinkle a tall glass with us. This is the invitation.

John advises me you will be billetted close by, just down the road he says, and were we able to be here when you arrive, we would insist that you take our hutch for the duration. However, if it will fit your scheme, and we hope it does, let's set Sunday evening the 12th of July as the date for a shirt-tailout no-shoes get together atop the Weatherwax dune. (the swimming pool is not finished but a good shallow dive would be spectacular in the 18-inches of rain water that's collected in it.)

I want to hear you do "Down in the Le-high valley" with gestures.

John is extending this invitation to Coie so he will be forwarned. However, mind you oh Beaver minstrel, this is to be no stuffed shirt function. It will necessarily be impromptu, rough-hewn and unrehearsed. It is not to be an exhibit of the producer of "Person to Possum", but by God a down-to-earth rib-cracker with salt-on-it.

I will be out of reach of telephone, telegraph, radio, TV or Navajo runner for the next two weeks, but if you have a protest to this proposition, address me General delivery, San Diego, California, where I will punch in about June 28th.

Tell Mrs. M.

Dear Mr. Murrow;

As you were so kind to me and also instrumental in the developement of my trip to Europe, I thought I would just take another moment of your time to drop you a note and tell you how much I appreciated your time and your help.

Just a word of what I am doing---- At the present time I am working at the European Edition of the Herald Tribune, doing mainly circulation and promotion work. I will probably stop working here in another two weeks and spend the next seven weeks travelling throughout the Continent in order to complete my articles for Pan-America. I do not know if you have been in any further contact with Dave Parsons from the time I saw you last, so I will fill you in on the developement of my meetings with him.

After several meetings with him, Mr. Parsons and I set up a program under which I would write a series of articles on European Universities for the Pan-American Airway's public relations department in exchange for round-trip flight transportation to Europe. Coupled with two month's work at the Herald Tribune I have so far fortunately been able to avoid that great loss of face of all college people, commonly called "cabling the Old Man for money". Added to this I have been able to set up a small black-market-money-changing operation for twenty-five timid college girls, was a "very" silent partner in introducing two American colored-boys to the local gangster who agreed to smuggle them into Italy,(they supposedly had misplaced their passports), and am presently working to load one poor American student on one poor tramp steamer as the proverbial stow-away. Add to this a little Parisian night life, a few words of the local language, and an occasional jug of wine, and one observes the Continent more through a process of osmosis than by a tourist routine.

On the serious side, though, I do want to do a top-flight job for Dave Parsons; first, because I realize it was only because of your reccomendation that he considered this position for me, and, second, because these people at Pan-Am. have been extremely kind to me.

After I return, I should be most pleased to see you again, if convénient for you, at either your office or your Pawling home some weekend. And again, I do want you to know that I greatly appreciated your kindness.

You asked me to stop by and see you in your office (workshop you called it) during the following week. I did so, but, unfortunately, you were out at the time I called. I would be delighted to talk to you in late August, if you have some time. To that end, I will call your office when I return to New York, which will be in approximately 3 weeks, as I move to the Dominican Republic tomorrow and then toward the U.S.

Dear Mr. Whales:

Your letter of July 25th was held pending my return from vacation.

I want to thank you for your suggestion, but regret to have to tell you that we are not now in a position to undertake programs in addition to those we are already producing.

As you say, your suggestion follows somewhat the format of my present programs and we are not proposing to expand these in any way at this time.

Sincerely yours,

Dear Sir:

"SEE THEM NOW", copyright for which has been applied, is a program designed to present live or on film, for television, celebrities; stars of the entertainment and sports fields; political and controversial figures; national heroes and others of a past era who have retired or otherwise faded from public life.

Each show will present a star of the past. It will show the person as he looks today; where he lives; his home; his family; how he makes a living; how he has fared over the years; his interest in the profession; his hobbies and other interesting details of his present life.

The show should be fifteen minutes or half an hour, depending upon the importance of the subject. Or it could be divided into two segments of fifteen minutes each, much as your PERSON TO PERSON show. It should be most informal, with the subject acting as host, and giving the impression to the audience of being most welcome in his home and to see him after all these years. There should be no mawkish sentimentality; no striving for pathos or tears; no wistful wishing to relive bygone days; but a quiet, dignified visit as among old friends.

With the subject, as guest, should be a "name" personality, one who is skilled in the art of interviewing and also an authority on the subject's profession. He should draw out the interesting facts of the subject's present life, and perhaps, where feasible, introduce film clips of the subject at his peak.

This would make a great human interest story, and a program of this type should command a sizeable audience. There are over 70,000,000 people forty years of age or over whose heroes these retired stars of the past were. They would be much interested in seeing what has become of the great and the near great of their day and how they are getting along now. Newspapers and magaznies devote many of their stories to people and events of the past, but they devote themselves to the events as they occured and to the people as they appeared at the time. But not the people as they appear now.

For example, Ty Cobb, Lefty Grove, Home Run Baker, Cy Williams, Jack Dempsey, Jess Willard, Gene Tunney, Red Grange, Bobby Jones, Laurel and Hardy, Helen Wills Moody, Col. Charles Lindbergh, Rev. Charles E. Coughlin and scores of others, both men and women, not forgetting Admiral Byrd, each would make an excellent and interesting subject for a program devoted to his present life.

This follows, somewhat, the format of your present shows. As you have the organization to handle such a program I would like to offer it to you first before approaching other producers or networks.

If you are interested I would be glad to make arrangements for a further discussion with your organization in New York.

Very truly yours,

Charles J. Whales

Dear Ed Murrow:

Thank you for thinking of me in connection with Sir Winston Churchill's record. I am looking forward to hearing it.

Here is Walter's book which he discussed on PERSON-TO-PERSON. At that time, as I recall it, it had not been titled. I have had several interesting conversations lately with persons interested in various aspects of race relations and there is considerable argument about whether or not that "Promised Land" is farther away than it was when Walter finished the book. Some people feel that recent outbreaks of violence and the growth of anti-Negro societies represent merely the last gasp of fanatics driven to the wall. Others feel that it may herald a new wave of victory, a kind of neo-Nazism, Dixie brand.

With these diverse opinions being widely expressed and the great need for the kind of information which Walter has given in his book, I am wondering whether this might not be a timely subject for SEE IT NOW. What do you think?

Most sincerely,

Poppy

My dear Ed. Murrow, 10.2.55.

Well, like a Texan dust-storm you have come and gone, and all I see are little devils dancing along the pavements....

Seriously: a charming nymph (I cannot call her female) spoke to me a short time ago, over the 'phone, conveying your apologies in such honeyed and soothing accents that my heart melted and my disappointment was assuaged. But now the voice is no longer with me I find that I am indeed disappointed, and that I am not assuaged. I understand, full well, how busy you've been, and know that during your all-too-short spell here you must have been rushing around like the proverbial scalded cat. So I freely forgive you. But I am still disappointed.

I certainly hope we'll meet when you are next here. Before then, I think, you'll be hearing more about me from and through other sources. There is something happening along my orbital track that is gradually bringing a bit of luck to me at last--and I think it will culminate in the immediate months ahead. I am, in some ways, getting myself back into the news as I did so much before the war. Then--before we met--I was really very wellknown until a string of major operations, the war, loss of my business et al put me out flat on my back in more ways than one...But my spiritual steam has never lessened, and my spiritual light has never burned low, and--as above--I think things are developing favourably for me after something like 15 years of very hard work, very ill-health, and very bad luck.

Why did Regnery's of Chicago buy (some months back) 2000 copies of my NEW HANDBOOK ON HANGING? Are they thinking of stringing up Mr. J.McC. in the Mid-West (I hope so). Why this interest in that rare book? The author, Chas. Duff, was head of the Press Section in the Foreign Office from 1919 to 1937. He is a noted linguist, well known author, and much travelled traveller. He claims to be an Anarchist--seriously, I mean. I had a note from him two days ago saying he was off as a Professor to Nanyang University, Singapore. Tho' he didn't tell me waht he was going tp "profess" He's an Irishman. If you haven't got a copy of this work, which is literature with a capital "L", then let me know. I'll snd you one with pleasure. Its the most blistering bit of satire written since the days of Swift. And only an Irishman could have done it. It is so anti-Capital Punishment that half the morons who read it write to me protesting that "Such a well educated man as Mr. Duff should urge bigger and better hangings" Oh! yes, you must read this...It came out first in the mid-20's, and has been re-written, revised, extended and issued many times until this the final, definitive edition. You'll get many a laugh and many a grim chuckle--believe it or not--out of a NEW HANDBOOK ON HANGING.

Good luck attend you. May the Gods both great and small look after you and yours.

Your disappointed friend and distant admirer

James

WHO'S WHO IN AMERICA

CABLES AND RADIOGRAMS: MARQUIS-CHICAGO PUBLISHED BY MARQUIS PUBLICATIONS BUILDING-CHICAGO-11 U S A

THE A. N. MARQUIS COMPANY

Returned Bio 1/25

1897 - Our Fifty-Eighth Year - 1955

Dear Biographee:

Your principal biographical data, as now in our files here, are on the enclosed card.

This card is from the "Who's Who in America" section of the Marquis National Biographee Reference File, as a biography-in-brief of you was printed in the current volume of "Who's Who." The M. N. B. R. File has been compiled (since 1939) to bring together those in this country who fall under the tested Marquis standards - for measuring meritorious subjectivity to reference inquiry - based on a half-century of experience in publishing biographical dictionaries.

(Data you may have supplied to our Editors since the publication of the clip pasted on this card are NOT entered on it, being located separately in the M. N. B. R. File.

It has been taken out of the File and sent to you because this "Who's Who in America" section containing your data happens to be under the customary thorough once-every-two-years revision.

This particular section of the File is necessarily carefully revised in step with the biennial publication of "Who's Who" early in each "even year" - the next biennial issue will be volume 29.

Our Editors ask your cooperation to the extent of rechecking this File card, in the convenient manner noted on it, and then returning it to them in the accompanying no-postage-required envelope.

The Editors must hereafter prepare all biographies-in-brief of you - to be published in any Marquis biographical dictionary - after referring to this File card. (The clip pasted on the card is here used merely as a filing convenience. Your card enclosed will be the reference key to all data concerning you which are available to our Editors.)

I am confident you heartily agree it is to your advantage, as well as to ours, that your File card carrying your principal personal data pass under your eye in the course of each revision of the section in which it has been most recently placed by our Editors.

(It is not reasonable, moreover, to expect that proofreaders and compilers will always be satisfactorily familiar with individual dates and names, personal preferences in respect to biographical data, and the like.)

That extending this cooperation is obviously in both your interest and theirs, will not in the slightest lessen the Editors' appreciation of it as a vital assistance in assuring reference competency to Marquis compilations.

I feel you will also agree it is fitting to mention that in addition to endeavoring to assemble current and accurate data regarding those selected for listing in the Marquis National Biographee Reference File . . .

we extend them, as some tangible reciprocation for their cooperation in supplying such data to our Editors, considerable discount preferences which they may apply on their personal advance-of-publication bookings of our biographical dictionaries.

It goes without saying that you are welcome, on returning the enclosed card, to take immediate advantage of this biographees' subscription privilege as applicable to the forthcoming new Twenty-Ninth Edition of "Who's Who in America" described in the accompanying leaflet ($16.90 instead of the regular after-publication retail price of $22.15). ("Who's Who" for vocational, professional or commercial reference usage is of course a tax deductible expense.)

Accordingly, a suitable form will be enclosed which, when validated by your signature, so provides - the postpaid envelope for returning your M. N. B. R. File card may be also used for it, of course.

And I know it need not be restated here, as you have been previously - and are currently - listed in Marquis reference works, that no obligation whatsoever on your part attaches to extending the cooperation with our staff here bespoken. Instead, as I have purposely emphasized in this letter, the Editors consider an obligation is placed on them, and we offer both tangible and intangible reciprocation to the best of our ability.

May I not here thank you in advance in anticipation of our receiving that cooperation from you?

Dear Mrs. Whyte:

First of all, may I apologize for the delay in replying to your letter of November 10th.

I hate to appear churlish or ungrateful, but I cannot imagine that I could make any contribution to the program the Junior League of Mount Kisco proposes to sponsor in Northern Westchester.

I am afraid it would be a waste of your time and Mrs. Calder's to discuss this with me, but perhaps Mrs. Calder could give me a ring in the country some weekend and we could discuss it then.

In connection with the Geneva Conference of Foreign Ministers our organization intends to hold a discussion panel on East-West Relations and possibility of rolling back the Iron Curtain in the field of the freedom of the press, flow of information and cultural and other exchanges. We are inviting to the panel three American, two Western European and two Eastern European exiled journalists. We have reason to believe that the panel will be televised.

The Overseas Press Club is sponsoring us in this matter. The panel will be held in the club's premises on November 10, 8 P.M.

This letter from Frank Wilson says:

Dear Ed:

I began to despair of ever having this finished. We had originally intended to run them off on parchment; the local printers undertook the job but, after many many weeks of fiddling around, decided they couldn't make the plates. Probably a good thing,for in the meantime we have changed designation again, presently (and I'm sure temporarily) known as the 59th WRF.

In sheer frustation I have thrown up my lily whites and knocked out a hand-made job. Crude but effective perhaps. The little individual cards "are still in the process, etc."

Hurricane season officially opened for us on 1 June but, as you may or may not know, we flew the first one on 2 Jan., down off Puerto Rico. Li'l Alice was quite sweet and calm.

If you ever feel in need of a few day's peace and quiet drop on over. I shall clean face mask and flippers and do battle with some lobster -- Joyce makes the greatest thermidor you ever thermed. Leave us see -- a round of golf, a swim, a blender full of frozen Daiquiris and Lobster Thermidor -- that should take the edge off frayed nerves huh?

Steve, age 5 months 3 days, doubles in as daiquiri fixer and disk jockey, so our only expenditure of energy could be in sighs of utter contentment.

The "360" turns and turns and sounds better with each turn -- I kick my radio every time I pass it.

Made a quick trip to England in May -- returned a B-29 we had borrowed. The weather was bad but England is still wonderful. Browsed around the Cambridge locks for a couple of days, drove up and down the river in a friend's Cruiser (those wonderful old river locks, hand-powered type) nosed around London for a day, in the rain as usual, and had a fine flight back on BOAC. My goodness, they really take care of you. The stewardess had to guide me carefully down the ramp upon arrival. This, of course, failed to impress my wife.

Kindley Air Force Base will have TV on 4 July -- canned shows will be sent from the U.S. Fine deal.

Don't forget that there will always be a room reserved for Edw. R. at the Wilson home.

Dear Ed:

I certainly enjoyed meeting you and attending the "Person to Person" show last Friday. It was most interesting seeing how the show is produced, and I marveled at the smoothness of the operation.

Attached you will find a March listing of Young & Rubicam Radio-Television activity which includes primarily networks. It will be a pleasure to have "Person to Person" as an addition to our fall list.

I plan to be in New York again next Monday with Gordon Howard, Advertising Manager of Elgin, and will undoubtedly see you at that time.

Before closing I would like to add, that John, Jesse and Miss Scofield have been extremely cooperative in getting us off to a good start with "Person to Person", and this cooperation is greatly appreciated by all concerned.

Dear Ed,

Will you be coming over for the Geneva conference and,on your way, through Paris? If so I hope we shall be seeing you,either here or in Geneva. Gisella and Christopher (two years old today and ad-libbing wonderfully in French with a Parisian accent)will be going to St.Cergue near Geneva about July 7th but I shall be staying in Paris until about the 15th,then joining the family and commuting daily from St.Cergue to Geneva for the during of the big show. I am finally out of Unesco,glad of the fact but not too glad of the prospect of feeding the family from the proceeds of free lancing. Still we have a pleasant flat here,with nearly all the rent paid for three years in advance,and I've worked my way out of uncomfortably tight spots in the past.

Gisella asked me to give warm greetings to the family,in which I join.

Dear Mr. Witt:

Thank you for your thoughtful letter of October 18th.

It would have been more informative had you been more specific. I am fully aware of the high fatality rate among radio commentators. But I fail to recognize myself in the rather sweeping category of individuals cluttering up the air around seven o'clock.

You speak of "derivative authority". Do you mean the authority of the Church, the authority of the majority, the authority of the Constitution, the Courts, or the authority of those who are frightened of ideas?

Thanks for telling me, vaguely, what you think of me. It is at least refreshing to be accused of having uttered a pronunciamento. This is altogether a new experience.

Sincerely yours,

Dear Sir:

Ordinarily I do not write letters of disapproval to any public figure. I firmly believe that if everybody is calm, all will be well. However, I find your starry-eyed pronunciamento that it is your bounden duty to defend unpopular people and unpopular ideas.a little irksome. I am referring to your appearance on the Ed Sullivan show, Sunday, October 16th.

I wonder if you and people like you who have the public's ear ever ponder the grave responsibility you have. Good reporters are a scarce commodity these days. When I turn my radio on at seven each evening, I try to sort out the commentators. One is an outright pinko, one is a fatuous old windbag. Another has a managerial ax to grind for a large corporation and his competition yelps just as loud for some kind of labor union. It behooves each reporter who editorializes on radio or TV these days to look to his next pay check. I am old enough to recall the remarkably high fatality rate among radio commentators. Some of them just do not last long at all.

Maybe I am flattering myself to think that I can spot a phony, but it annoys me to hear long and tedious resolutions to defend liberty, freedom and our inalienable rights. I saw a quote recently in TIME magazine (Oct. 10, 1955) which was a refreshing clarification of a much-belabored subject.

The quote is as follows: In his sermon at the annual "Red Mass" (so called for its red vestments, worn in Masses invoking the guidance of the Holy Ghost) of the New York Guild of Catholic Lawyers, the Rev. Laurence J. McGinley, S.J., president of Fordham University, attacked the "obsessive liberalism" of the present day--- "that frightened and frantic pursuit of freedom alone and at all costs." Obsessive liberalism, he said, "not only seeks an excess of freedom but denies any function to authority save that which is temporary, remedial---and for others. It has made 'authoritarian' a bad word in the semantics of our day. It has proliferated committees in defense of every freedom, but none to uphold authority. It has identified social progress only with the expansion of liberties and the severing of authority's bonds. Basically and most dangerously, it is egocentric, as all obsessions are, in its refusal to acknowledge any authority, whether of man or God."

How, in any interpretation of honesty, can you pretend to defend so-called unpopular people and ideas because "you saw your friends butchered by the Nazis and Communists." If there is a link there, I fail to see it. I am highly suspicious of persons who use this casuistic approach to our precious liberties without ever a nod to the necessarily attending responsibility to authority.

And in this connection, I wonder what will be your reaction to the coming Supreme Court hearing the Communists have arranged to argue their "rights" before the Court. I am not protesting their right to argue. The Court is to be commended for hearing the case. It will have tremendous effects on our judicial system. And as these arguments are given the full treatment in our press and on radio and TV (such is the nature of our free press) I wonder how much emphasis will be placed on the the responsibility to authority which cannot in all honesty be ignored.

And while you grow misty-eyed over the lack of freedom, and eexpress great fears about our freedoms, I have a still greater fear of the lack of respect for authority which to my thinking is inseparable from the freedom it guarantees. It is a very sad thing indeed when this generation clamors for reassurances that its freedom shall not be abridged, yet refuses to give equal sober thought to the maintenance of derivative authority.

Yours truly,

AUGUST 25, 1955

Dear Ed,

Last week, at lunch with Jap Gude, I sought to secure your professional services for a half-hour (possibly full hour) TV show. The date is not fixed. Late November looks like it might be it.

The show will be delivered under the auspices of the National Association for Mental Health. Barry Ryan, of Ruthrauff & R) is president of this outfit. I believe Ruthrauff is president or chairman of a county chapter, maybeMonmouth. Frank Stanton is active in the Association, is giving his personal support to the show problem, and is endeavouring to find time. (I get this from Ruthrauff).

With me at Jap Gude's lunch was Dick Bostwick, public relations for Smith-Klein-French, Philadelphia drug firm (ethical). They are providing a 'subvention of funds' to make the show possible. Four or five times now this house has made extraordinary use of television. I'm sure you know this.

Smith-Klein-French make Chlorpromazine - trade name is Thorazine. In the treatment of institutionalized psychiatric patients, the use of Thorazine represents the most important break-through that science -- pharmacology in this case -- has provided the mentally disturbed.

Most of the 'mental' shows on TV have been far too tame for the story they should really be telling. Bostwick and a film crew and myself will be shooting film on the back wards (violent, disturbed) in Chicago State Hospital and Cook County Psychopathic beginning Tuesday morning, September 6th. We expect to be finished on the 15th.

We've been pretty agonizingly thru these bedlams, have secured the necessary go-aheads from Illinois authorities, are going back this Monday to start setting up -- a week of pre-production - we'll have to shoot some of it from behind protective screen. Some can't be shown the public -- the nudity, the joyous indifference to bathrooms -- but we're going to film it.

The main purpose: to show the public that the hopeless situation of the insane is not any longer quite so hopeless; to do this by showing patients in most acute states of psychomotor excitement, then the almost instantaneous remission of excitement Thorazine brings them; then, the gradual and dramatic recovery that 3,4, or 5 weeks of maintenance treatment this drug brings to them.

I very much want you to emcee this show when it happens. So does everyone involved.

MAX WYLIE

For practical concerns:

You won't have to be present at any of the Chicago shooting.

You may (naturally) see all the footage taken there.

Smith-Klein-French will pay your fee (natch)

Not known at this moment:

Actually TV broadcast date.
Whether hour or ½-hour.

I am going to write the show, insofar as it requires written words. I can testify to the truth of the following about Thorazine (and this is the only plug I'm putting in this letter): "In patients who show a great deal of initial excitement, particularly those with manic and schizo-affective disorders, the medication is practically specific." This is the finding of the doctor (Goldman) who runs the Longview State Hospital in Cincinnati. In the Delaware State, they have discontinued all restraints, discontinued hydrotherapy.

The camera crew is from the Butterfield-Wolfe (Information Productions). I think Fred Friendly knows Tom Wolfe quite well. I have written some stuff that you may of course see but it's 'pre-flight' necessarily. There can't be any script, as such, yet; but you may get a flavor from it. Let me know.

I would think this could take you two days' time, and can promise it won't take you out of New York.

If Frank Stanton can find an hour for us, not just a half-hour, it is my objective belief that this will be the most important medical show that television has so far produced.

I can fill you in on any area this letter hasn't touched. I don't want to run on. I hope you can do it, and that you will want to.

Very best to you, as usual, Ed,

Max W.

EDUCATION, AND TELEVISION

EMENT AND A CONCRETE PLAN

n Max Wylie

- - - - - -

Some weeks ago I said to Mr. Heiskell that the marriage between education and television did not yet appear to be compatible; that this seemed unfortunate; that the two forces seemed to be working against each other; and that in my personal and professional judgment most educators, even serious educators, did not seem much closer to making good use of the apparatus of television today than they had been to making the best use of radio networks at any time during the past 25 years. Many educators seem to recognize this as the situation, and to deplore it without being able to bring much remedy to it. Almost all of them want to use television, and to use it properly. At least they say so, and it is assumed that in most cases their desire to effect this is genuine.

In the same chat with Mr. Heiskell I stated what I thought was the real core of this whole problem and recommended - if a plan were submitted that seemed good enough to be looked at further or developed further - that some time be provided for the purpose of exploring its merits and its defects; then deciding whether to proceed with it or drop it.

Such a plan is contained in these days. (See page 21)

THE HEART OF THE MATTER

The core of the problem, in my judgment, is that while the educators want to do something, they do not know what it is. The invitation to use television is too vast and too various. Their problem would lighten, even begin to clear up, if they had (for example) a single product in great abundance; if they recognized that they had it, that it was characteristically and peculiarly education's own product, not suppliable to the American public from any other source. And that the American public wanted this product.

Their problem would begin to clear up if they realized they did have television material in great abundance; material that was unique, rich, inexhaustible; something the networks didn't have. And it would begin to clear up and arrange itself in sensible forms of expanding influence, all over the land and in the deepest penetration, as soon as a regular ~~began to perform~~ scheduling of this material came out of committee and began to perform in front of a camera.

WHAT IS THIS PRODUCT? WHERE IS THIS MATERIAL?

It is the gifted teacher, whose perishables are offered three times a week to thirty or forty undergraduates; there admired, but thereafter and forever lost.

The one basic product of undiminishing worth that the college and university has to offer the public, thru television, is the gifted teacher (not the scholar, never the scholar). He's always been there; always will be. But he's scarce and he's destructible.

The great force of the lecture hall on the American campus is still confined to the single campus, and to the few in the single room. To be sure, this force is a continuing force in that it renews itself each semester or each year, and transmits its impulses to a new audience of of students. But the confinement of it to these areas keeps this audience small; keeps it among the few who have paid to attend.

The educator snubs the best television product he has; his best teachers. He did the same thing in radio, and largely failed there, and largely for that reason. He had a product then, and either didn't or couldn't recognize it. In any case he never used it.

In talking with Mr. Heiskell, the name of Professor Hubert Alyea came up. (The electrifying effect which Frank Baxter created over KNXT had not yet been delivered. It came about ten days later.)

Though neither teacher is perfect in all points of suitability for the uses of TV, either one is an example of the exact kind of use - or exploitation, if the word is preferred - to which radio people wanted to put the professors, when the professors were insisting some years ago that radio should use them.

SCHOLARSHIP AND SHOWMANSHIP ARE DEADLY ENEMIES

The same thing happened then that happened in TV not long ago when the Ford Foundation, in a series titled "Assembly VI," put a famous historian in front of the cameras to interpret current debate in the General Assembly of the United Nations. The historian was Arthur Schlessinger of Harvard, but in addition to being famous, he was a shuddering bore.

Roy K. Marshall was the first to point out some of the hard facts of life to his own fraternity, and here are some of them: When asked how he could give up his telescope at Ohio Wesleyan, he had a flat answer: "To be honest about it, there's a lot of money in this television business." But later comments were more valuable. Here are four that bear on the subject of education and television:- "I disapprove the segregation of culture on one channel. I don't care how snobbish you are--a door marked 'entertainment' is more inviting than one marked 'education.'" ... "I don't think a school should be given a channel until it draws up a complete program schedule and does a 'dry run'. There's been no real appreciation by the educators of the problem involved in operating their own stations."..... "If they're so interested in visual education, why don't they make their own films?"... And finally, when asked if scholars should do the teaching: "No. You have to pick a personality that comes right through that tube."

EDUCATORS ACTUALLY HAVEN'T ASSEMBLED ENOUGH THAT'S GOOD ENOUGH

Because TV requires such endless feeding, the absolute necessity of creating material in great abundance; the necessity of keeping it coming regularly, and if need be forever, has had two effects: it has scared off most educators who have enthusiastically left the problem to others; and it has resulted in an almost meaningless dispersal, in broken schedules and on scattered transmitters, of most of the efforts that finally did reach production. Little has had real sequence, stability, regularity or significance. The quality of the product has not been worth the attentions of the networks or stations (in most cases). And the quantity of the product has been insufficient to promise a substantial run.

AN HONEST EFFORT IS BACKED BY THE SLOAN FOUNDATION

A quantity of product sufficient to promise a substantial run was created by a grant from the Alfred P. Sloan Foundation. It is called "American Inventory." The first television show was seen on July 1, 1951. A year later investigators were sent out to the NBC television cities to see why the programs, though offered, were getting less and less acceptance from the stations. Marjorie Kerr was one of these investigators. She reported to the Foundation, upon her return, that stations didn't want the programs because they were bad programs and local communities weren't watching them.

I saw most of these, and still see them. Most of them are bad. They are pious or balefully improving in their purpose, but sterile in content; and leave no feeling, nor any fecundating effect upon the beholder. They make another continuing mistake, often ruinous: they use big people and give them little to do.

It is usually appalling when foundations try to do anything simple. Their stated purpose in this series is "to take an inventory of the plus values in our American way of life." It's a lot easier, though, to make up a phrase like this than to take it into rehearsal. The series is not popular, the shows are not television, the result is not educational.

Part of the reasons they are poorly attended is because they are immature and stationary. And unrelated. The subject matter is in a constant jiggle of improvisation, between the kittenish and the patriarchal; between Margot and Judge Leibowitz. Audiences don't know what is intended.

This effort is not here being disparaged, or even discredited, as to its purpose. It is mentioned here because some serious workmen in the field of educational TV have spent some impressive money, given to them from respectable sources with high intentions, and little measureable good has been done by it. It happens whenever entrenched purity of intention collides with the horrible reality of bad dialogue, inadequate rehearsal time, and station acceptance.

(To its vast credit let it be said that at least there has been enough energy to get some sort of product together and to get it regularly before cameras.)

BUT THERE IS MORE WASTE THAN RESULT

This represents (to me) the first big area of waste. It would not be waste if the programs were so good they could bear repeating; or if they were good enough to be remembered. Or even talked about. But they are only good enough to win Peabody Awards, and this by now has come too often to mean drought.

SURVEYS THAT DON'T KNOW WHAT THEY SAW

The second area of waste is the survey, and more particularly the kind being conducted in the Monitoring Studies made possible thru a grant from the Fund for Adult Education. These studies have been going on for more than two years and are attracting much attention among educators. But there are some suggestive silences when serious television people put a few simple questions to members of the NAEB committee.

What is the committee going to do with its findings?

What are these findings?"

Is there a recommendation as a result of the findings? What is it?

Who is aware of these studies besides educators?

How do those who conduct these studies know whether the monitored TV programs 'relate to the needs of the community' when they don't know what these needs are and when they don't evaluate the contents of any of the programs?

To serious-minded people in television, (less theoretical but more pragmatic perhaps than the educators) it seems unthinkable that anything even remotely sensible is going to come out of any of this huge labor. Since the Monitoring Studies care nothing about program content and in fact remind the reader over and over that the studies "do not measure the artistic values embodied in the programs....do not measure the psychological, esthetic, or political effects of the programs," why could they not have reproduced their present results merely by printing the program logs of the stations whose shows they screened? Viewers are not even allowed to describe what they looked at; can only make mechanical entry of second-by-second segments.

In this regard the enormous number of hours and of human energy consumed might just as accurately relate to so many radio shows as TV shows.

WHAT'S NEW ABOUT ANY OF THIS?

Two important sources already knew what was going on in television, in those areas canvassed by the monitoring crews, and one of these sources was the group of stations that delivered the programs to the community and the other source was the community that received them. It is not nearly so likely that the television industry will repudiate the study as that it will never hear of it, for it is almost as barren of usable content as a report on Shakespeare that counts all of the commas without reading the plays. Or a report on the Great Lakes that weighs the water without finding out if it's navigable, fish-bearing, or safe to drink.

THIS NAEB SURVEY IGNORES TWO GREAT BASICS, EMOTIONAL CONTENT AND AUDIENCE ACCEPTANCE

As to their method and purpose, I have taken a sharp look and come away with a dim view. In conducting this survey, groups of observers sit before television sets, one set for each channel in the city being surveyed, and write down everything they see that can be put on a page in terms of elapsed time, and everything that can be put down in terms of a count, such as revolver shots in Westerns. No one asks anyone how he feels about anything, whether anything seen was impressive, or good or bad. The monitoring crews don't know whether the communities they visited (*) enjoyed their TV or hated it, how much of what kind of shows was looked at, or whether - if they weren't getting something they should be getting - what that something should be. No conclusions or recommendations come out of any of this. Only a count.

(*) In Los Angeles, Stations KTSL, KNBH, KTLA, KECA-TV, KFI-TV, KTTV, KLAC-TV (May 23-29, 1951); in New York, Jan 4-10 (1951, repeated in 1952) WCBS-TV, WJZ-TV, WNBT, WPIX, WATV, WOR-TV, WABD; in New Haven, WNHC-TV (May 15-21, 1952); Chicago, July 30-August 5, 1951) WBKB, WNBQ, WENR-TV, WGN-TV.

To the few patient observers in commercial television who have conscientiously gone thru The Monitoring Studies as conducted to date, the survey promises to become an indicator pointing the directions of education's longest statistical journey-to-nowhere. The survey does not promise to become the working basis for serious answers to the questions put in their own prefaces.(*)

These studies may presently be forgotten. Or the reverse could happen: they could become legendary for their spectacular preoccupation with the impractical. Surely they are a pitiful waste of money, almost ~~of~~ a shocking waste.

The third area of waste is the money and labor assigned to another Foundation effort, (Fund for Adult Education) Ford money this time, with the end-product being the first half-hour TV film in a projected series that has been started in Chicago. The first film is called "The Independent Mr. Jefferson." It is not very dramatic or interesting, but it is well acted and well written.

(*) The National Association of Educational Broadcasters conducts the Monitoring Studies and asks these questions in the prefaces of the published reports: Has the pattern of American television programming already been molded? What is this pattern? What are the changes in American television programming? How does the American television programming relate to and reflect the needs of the community?

WHAT'S THE MATTER WITH IT?

There is waste in this effort, however, and it is right here: the go-ahead money was made available in late 1952. Work on the production of "Jefferson" began in February 1953. Actors went before rehearsal cameras in May, and into costume rehearsals in June. The show was in the can in early July. It has had one showing in New York, and others elsewhere. It is the first of the series. Nearly a year has passed and the second is not yet written and no schedule exists for its production.

The necessity for product, regularly delivered, has not been recognized here and the series is expiring for this reason.

These three examples - "American Inventory," the Monitoring Studies, and the dramatic effort "The Independent Mr. Jefferson" (for Adult Education) were all sincerely undertaken and are still being worked on. But they suggest the probable basic and discouraging truth about TV and education via the Foundation route: Foundations are too cumbersome to make good use of television for defined educational purposes.

THE ENCYCLOPAEDIA BRITANNICA FILM LIBRARY

A small success in the field of visual education is being enjoyed by this little company and a few comments about it belong in these pages. Their reservoir of product contains 540 films, some in color. New reels on new subjects are added to the basic library at the rate of about 25 a year. Encyclopaedia Britannica Films, hereafter referred to as EBF, do a gross annual business of a little over two million dollars. They put out two attractive catalogues each year, maintain nine regional preview libraries and a staff of representatives of about fifty.

The quality of the photography is on the whole good. EBF prefers to sell their product outright, but they also have a schedule for rentals, and a third system, Rent-to-Own. They sell to schools, colleges, and municipal libraries.

COSTS, SUBJECTS, AND AGE GROUPS

EBF sells black and white at about $50.00 a reel, $85.00 for two reels (if same subject). Color is about double this figure or $100.00 a reel, $170.00 for two reels, $330.00 for four. Most subjects (90%) are one-reel.

Subjects photographed range in variety from a reel on fungus plants to a reel which explores an average day in the life of a bus driver. Over 200 subjects are touched upon in this library of 540 films, much of it related to school subjects in the average American curriculum. About 20% of the product is for primary grades, 70% for middle grades and high school, the rest for college and adult groups.

There is about one film per subject, rarely more than two. The total represents a bright jungle of moving mediocrity that is making money. Their most successful efforts are travel reels, nature studies and laboratory demonstrations. Their least successful are biography: (Franklin, Jackson, Hamilton, etc.); history (Colonial Expansion, The Founding of Salem.) (Anything requiring a costume is likely to become awkward very early.)

It is doubtful if an impression is being made on adult groups, but obvious and useful delights, plus valuable supplementary materials, are here in small numbers and small amounts for a huge number of subjects; and from primary grade requirements thru high school. Manifestly, the strongest appeal is novelty.

EBFilms claims that more than 70% of all teaching films used in America are from their library. The percentage claim might be challenged by some of their competitors (there are now over 40 organizations making educational films) but there is no doubt about EBF being the leader of the field.

EBFilms is succeeding (modestly) where it is trying to. It has a serious visual-education purpose. It is not in any way related to TV.

"American Inventory" - another serious visual-education effort, is not succeeding and it is directly related to TV, exists only as TV.

In the former, the buyer may select what he wishes, (a considerable psychological plus). And he has a captive audience before whom to display it, (an unbeatable physical plus).

In the latter, the product is at the mercy of a heterogeneous public with the privilege of free selection among multiple choices. In television they won't look at "Inventory" unless there's nothing else. Don't have to look, irrespective of circumstances.

"American Inventory," shrunk down to size, might fit itself into the EBFilms library and do as well there as the other samples, but EBFilms, if thrown to the wolves that are the American multitude, would perish in a few weeks. And for the same reasons "Inventory" is having such trouble in TV now: individual shows aren't good enough to stand up alone; competition is smothering; total effort is cloudy in purpose, does not seem to relate to anything (in the viewers' minds) and is not developing as a series that makes sense.

Yet there are strong suggestions that the American public will take a lot of education by television, even formal education, if it is offered to them on a simple and regular basis. And there are some extraordinary examples, even dramatic examples, of this thing actually taking place and holding audiences over long periods of time.

NEW EXPERIMENT AT BRIDGEPORT

Ten or twelve universities are currently offering courses by television.

A talking professor is the most saleable commodity in American education.

They include NYU, Columbia, Western Reserve, Harvard, University of Houston, University of Omaha, Butler, UCLA, Toledo, Bridgeport, Oklahoma, and Southern California.

The experiences of the University of Bridgeport will be interesting (and perhaps important) in about a year. On October 12 this fall, over WICC-TV, five days a week for an hour (3:00-4:00 p.m.), two university courses were made available to the public by television. The courses will be offered for a full semester. One of these courses is conducted by a professor of sociology, Dr. Abraham Knepler. His lectures discuss "Personal Adjustment in Family Life." He appears before a studio classroom and talks to his own students. Dr. Milton Millhauser, his companion in this TV experiment, also talks from a classroom to his own students. His subject: "Living With Literature." Undergraduates naturally get diploma credits. However, so does the public that is within range of WICC's signal. Any viewer may receive full academic credit for the courses by paying the fees, watching the television lectures, doing the supplementary reading, and taking the examination at the end of the course. (Adjustment in Family Life is $48, Literature is $32.)

BRIDGEPORT GOT THE IDEA FROM WESTERN RESERVE, AND THE COURSE RATE TOO

Although it is too early to draw conclusions from Bridgeport, it is not too early to draw some from Cleveland. In and around this city, and from the campus of Western Reserve, some simple thinking and a quietly courageous decision has put something in motion there that is very illuminating to the problem of getting the influence of the college spread to greater audiences by television.

The man who made the decision was Western Reserve's President, John S. Millis. A few quotes from him will explain the problem as he saw it:

> "In a fumbling way, I think all of us, as educators, have been looking for a medium whereby we could amplify the effectiveness of the classroom and reach more and more people without raising our capital investment and our operating costs to an impossible level. And for that reason, we have looked with substantial regret at the fact that we missed the opportunity of the motion picture; we missed, in a very large degree, the opportunity presented by radio. Then came television....and we had a rather desperate feeling that if we miss this particular medium, we will miss the third and final medium for education on a large scale. ... We decided to take the classroom as we normally know it, and to use it to reach a very considerably increased audience. ... We decided to adapt the medium of television to our ends...rather than trying to adapt ours to television as we see it in the commercial sense. .... And we decided to select teachers with care...."
> "About a year ago (that would be September, 1951) we decided to offer two college courses for credit by television: Elementary Psychology and Comparative Literature.... We expected small enrollment but hoped for enough to find out if what we were doing was valid. Actual enrollment, which came without promotional effort on our part but from announcements over the station itself, brought in 66 individuals who paid $48 on the line, and 472 people who enrolled as auditors and paid $5, and who received the syllabus and the textbook. This was for the Psychology course. Literature drew 42 for the course, and 228 as auditors.

"A commercial survey (you know, those people who call up and say: 'Are you looking at television? If so, what program are you looking at?') showed us a steady audience, each day, of 58,000."

WHAT THEY FOUND IN CLEVELAND

President Millis and his faculty have now made many more findings and are in a new branch of education - projecting the voice, the face and gesture and personality, of hand-picked members of the Western Reserve faculty to all who wish to hear and to listen; who live within the audio-video range of WEWS. Western Reserve is developing a new instrument in the expanding workshop of communications.

They find they are feeding a true hunger. They find the television audience to be doing better work than the classroom student; to be writing better, and to be submitting more perceptive examinations. They find the television audience (the 'out-patients') more mature than the undergraduates, and for the reason that the age range is from 19 to 60; that most of those watching had had between 14 and 15 years of formal education, that many had done graduate work, that all wanted more education. Furthermore, it was a self-selected group, and the dean of Western Reserve couldn't do anything about those who failed to appear for finals.

It was the viewer's privilege. ¶ Regarding the teaching itself, the President said: "I have never seen the quality of teaching which has come over the television channels." The Cleveland libraries all reported a phenomenal rise in the use of books.

President Millis' five-part summary is lively:

1. "We have demonstrated that television can be adapted to formal education, with relative simplicity, and without loss of integrity or depreciating of standards; can be adapted to the use of the usual lecture method and by this alone can enlist large audiences.

2. "We have demonstrated that there are in the city of Cleveland 58,000 people who at 9:00 o'clock in the morning (and that means largely, the housewives, the shut-ins, and the retired folks) who have dropped their normal activities and devoted a half-hour or more to a very serious enterprise.

3. "We have demonstrated that what the TV students get in terms of quality and quantity both (which we measure by examination) is as great as that obtained in the classroom; that the TV students - under a controlled situation using the same examination given to the classroom students, the TV students perform, as a matter of statistical fact, much better than the undergraduates on the campus.

4. "We have shown that the medium is worth our very enthusiastic exploration; that it is now just within our grasp to do something which we have never been able to do, namely, bring the rich resources of our institution to bear upon the problems, the interest, and the needs, not of the handful of people who can afford the time to come to our campuses, but rather, the millions, the tens of millions of people who need, who can use, our wisdom, our knowledge, our skill, our art in their everyday problems.

5. "And finally, we have found television to be the most magnificent instrument for raising the quality of teaching, whether it be college teaching or elementary teaching. And it is my observation that college teaching needs the most improvement."

A talking professor is the most saleable commodity in American education. This has been known for a long long time by network broadcasters who were really anxious to see educators use their facilities and use them properly. Here is a quote (from 1939) that is apposite, and I hope interesting. It was delivered before The National Council of Teachers of English, in convention in Columbus, with Ohio State University as host:

"When university broadcasting stations and local stations become radio extensions of the universities themselves rather than amateur imitations of the networks; when these stations realize and make use of their own talents; when they start putting microphones on the desks of the best lecturers - not on the desks of the greatest scholars -; and when they begin to insist that the mikes be left undisturbed for a half-hour three times a week, at the same time, for the entire semester, then we shall begin to be effective as educators in radio."

I hope I may be forgiven for quoting myself. I seldom do so, seldom write or think anything quotable. This paragraph, however, is still the true essence of the problem of education over the air, either radio or television. There has never been any other problem as cleanly stateable as this. The quotation above, together with the full address, has been reprinted many times, and it is also Chapter 10 in "Radio And English Teaching" (Appleton-Century, 1941), a vigorous study of the whole problem edited by one of the most vigorous educators to concern himself with the problem, the late Max J. Herzberg.

The problem in television is the same. It is the problem of delivering into the presence of a camera a man, and there filming him and recording his utterance.

THE PLAN

The First Part

The plan is in two parts. The first part will bring a few selected professors (about 15) of superior teaching ability, and of both sexes; professors of the standard courses in the curricula of all American colleges and universities; bring them to a film studio where a minimum of six lectures from each professor will be recorded on motion-picture film and on tape simultaneously.

(A schedule of costs, for Tape and 35mm RCA, is attached. See Appendix A)

The first part is for the specific purpose of assembling the finest living product in the greatest quantity, at the lowest cost.

This part of the plan has no connection with television.

This part of the plan is to create film (and tape, for schools which have no projectors) that will be made available to any school or college or educational group, on a rental or direct-sale basis, in very much the same way that Encyclopaedia Britannica Films now reach their own markets.

Because these filmed and tape-recorded lectures will be on subjects that already command the major portion of the undergraduates' time - (let us call them the staple courses) - all of the unrelated efforts and the well-intentioned but dispersed hodge-podge that now makes up all libraries of educational film, will be avoided from the start.

All of the lectures recorded will be of immediate use to all teachers of standard courses, as supplementary material to what they are themselves now teaching. These films are therefore not amiable distractions but vigorous reinforcements of what our faculties, large and small, are now, and have been for many years, conducting: biology, history, anthropology, economics, literature, psychology, fine arts, botany, physiology, geology, chemistry, physics; all of the lecture courses in short, and most of the laboratory courses that do not specifically require student handling of apparatus. All of the knowledge of the world that can be taken in, while sitting still in the presence of sight and sound.

The voracity of television, which has been freely acknowledged by educators (but little dealt with by them), is so thoroughly understood by professional television people that that is why so much stress is being put on quantity in the first half of this plan. The effort can have neither impact nor future without a starting pool; and a pool of probably not less than 100 completed lectures, in canned reels, and with a minimum of 30 prints of each one (16 mm reductions) to keep the finished result in continuous and fruitful circulation.

When our teachers die, their skill is lost with their passing. Indeed, most of them, even the greatest, through the years of their most productive usefulness, are seldom known beyond their own campus. With the active support and the endorsement of LIFE, an expanding library of filmed classroom lectures - from a most modest beginning - can become in three years the greatest practical contribution which the techniques of communication have brought to the process of democratic education.

The first part of this two-part plan calls for the creation of this pool of film material, each filmed lecture to be standard in two respects only: in quality and in time (26 minutes).

The geographical spread of the skills to be used would suggest the sense of filming in three places, New York, Chicago, and Los Angeles. Other availabilities can be put to work when the plan has evolved far enough to require them, (except for the South, which is still very delinquent in its studio standards).

The plan also proposes putting into circulation the finished product as soon as it has existence as a finished set of lectures by the same professor: It is suggested, too, that in the beginning stages of this program, colleges and universities are informed by letter, and by insertions in LIFE, of the availability of this product, that a schedule of lectures-and-subjects-in-progress, together with the proper individual and university credits, be released at this time; and that an open catalogue be prepared and circulated at the end of the first six months, or at such time as the amount of completed work is considered sufficient to warrant this.

Getting the films into quick circulation (soon after the composite print has been reduced and copied) is indicated and for the obvious purpose of recovering, or beginning to recover, the basic investment.

It is suggested, further, that the rental scale for all film sets, in the preliminary months, be determined by the length of time their use is desired on any campus. (Or more crudely, the length of time it is kept away from other users.)

The purpose of having the same material on tape-recorded basis, in addition to film, is three-fold: to make the lectures available to colleges that want the material but have play-back equipment only; to make the lectures available to educational groups or interests whose budgets and facilities can't entertain the filmed product; and three, to make these college lectures available to all high schools and prep schools in America. (It is believed that the acceptance factor in this area alone will be surprisingly large. From the very beginning, too much educational material, both radio and TV, has been down-graded. This part of the plan calls for deliberate and uncompromising reversal of this practice.)

The essence of the first part of the plan is: first, the creation of film and film prints (and tape recordings) of classroom lectures by gifted American teachers; second, the announcement of the existence and availability of this material; third, the circulation of it, on a sale and rental basis at stated prices, for the purpose of getting back investment.

The concentration of effort in this first part of the plan is to get this material before classrooms, groups, and assemblies by using play-backs and projectors already in the schools, clubs, and meeting places.

No effort is made to use television.

The Second Part

We have seen the immediate purposes of the first part of this plan. Its ultimate purpose, however, is to create educational film of great public attractiveness, in such amount as to set aside the fears of television station managers and network program builders and program buyers over program starvation thru product insufficiency; and then, having set aside these fears, to lease these films to these outlets, local and network.

By leasing them, LIFE can always recapture the product of its own creation; never lose ownership or control. With proof (to station owners) of an initial sufficiency of product, LIFE's educational TV films will secure commercial sponsorship soon after they are offered for sale. And LIFE will reserve the right to determine suitability of such sponsorship.

In the few places where the proper teaching skill and a cooperating TV transmitter have been put together, the public acceptance of the result has been instantaneous, and very real and rich.

The plan as outlined here has some unfinished areas - a specific estimate of costs and organizational procedure being two of the larger ones - but the plan, which has been slowly evolving, is offered in this form and at this time because, in the belief of the writer, the time for this development in education by television has now come. And the energies to effect it are now here.

A television university, on a great scale - feeding its own local communities over local stations, is practical and possible, and it is far from reckless to expect it to be commercially sponsored, ~~to make~~ in a sufficient number of its hours, to make ~~of~~ itself-supporting; a university that is constantly renewing itself, constantly increasing its capacity and the quality of its treasure; and giving to the multitudes of this nation what has in the past been seen and heard only by the few.

What we capture now and film, we make imperishable for the delight and instruction ~~for~~ of generations we will never see but wish to serve.

In "The Responsibility for Decision in Foreign Policy," the leading article in the forthcoming Autumn issue of THE YALE REVIEW, Dean Acheson brings his experience as Secretary of State to bear on a vital and continuing problem of American government, a problem of such importance that our national survival could very well depend upon the manner in which it is faced.

We send you the enclosed offprint of Mr. Acheson's statement in the belief that you will find it of more than usual significance and interest.

THE RESPONSIBILITY FOR DECISION IN FOREIGN POLICY

BY DEAN ACHESON

IN GIVING one's reflections on "The Responsibility for Decision in Foreign Policy" two lines of thought occur. One concerns the importance of decisiveness in conducting foreign relations, the effect of indecision, or no decision, or contradictory decisions. The other relates to the body or person upon whom rests the final responsibility for making the decisions which determine our course as a nation, and how this task is or should be performed. Both lines start from a common point—where the responsibility and authority lie.

In our American system the President is the person charged with the heavy duty of giving us the line to follow in our dealings with other nations. But, wholly apart from constitutional and legal considerations, his will is not given unlimited scope. In the first place, he is making decisions about our relations with foreign nations—countries, areas, peoples outside of the United States where our laws do not govern and our writ does not run, where the preconceptions of American life are not taken for granted—in short, that vast portion of the earth's surface where Americans are foreigners. The very idea requires the enlightenment which came to the old mountaineer who took his first train ride from his Appalachian crossroads to town, with his face pressed against the window. When the train stopped, he heaved a deep sigh and said to his companion,

"John, there's a heap of folks between here and home, and I guess, by God, we ain't seen half of 'em."

Here is the beginning of understanding of foreign affairs.

It is amid the manifold complexities of the relations between the external world and our own by-no-means-simple country that the President must lay down the line to follow. Whether we, his fellow citizens, follow it or not is another matter. And this suggests the second factor qualifying the freedom of the President's will in reaching his decisions. He is deciding for this particular country at a particular time and under particular circumstances. So there is involved the kind of country and people he leads—the sort of ideas we have inherited and now hold, our traditions and affiliations, our physical resources and the use to which we are putting them and are capable of putting them. All these elements narrow and affect the course of decisions, as currents, winds, shoals, and land affect the decisions of the mariner.

But to return to our point, the final responsibility for decision lies with the President. Sometimes confusion arises about this. We hear it said that the National Security Council is to make, or has made, some important decision. This is an illusion, and a most troublesome one. The NSC decides nothing. It is merely a mechanism for preparing and presenting matters for the President's decision. The power and the responsibility lie with him. He can accept, modify, reject, or do nothing with recommendations from the Council, which is merely a meeting of certain of his advisers. If he does nothing, no decision is made, or a decision to do nothing is made by default. However much the Council's staff is elaborated, it remains a forum—and one which can be very useful—for determining the main problems which require decision and for presenting recommendations to the President.

Again, one reads from time to time that at some meeting with "leaders on the Hill" this or that matter of foreign policy was "decided." This, too, I believe, involves a misconception. These meetings produce not so much a decision of policy as opinions as to whether or how a particular proposal or decision in which Congressional action will be needed can be carried out. Again the responsibility for deciding whether or how to go ahead rests with the President.

It is placed there by the Constitution and confirmed by a century and three-quarters of experience. The Presidential system supported by the separation of powers is the special American contribution to the science and art of government. It is a contribution which presents its problems, which calls for strong and decisive leadership, but which, given such leadership, has served the country well. Under it the President, the only official in the country elected by all the people, the leader of the dominant political party, the chief magistrate, is the head. His cabinet officers, the chiefs of the departments of government, are selected by him, hold their tenure at his pleasure, and are advisers to him. They can be effective only through him and with his support.

Attempts to graft onto this system institutions and practices drawn from the cabinet of parliamentary systems are usually a mistake and can be mischievous. No good comes from attempts to dilute, share, or usurp the authority and responsibility of the President.

While no good comes from attempts to invade the authority and responsibility of the President, they are continually made and sometimes succeed. This occurs under weak Presidents. The result is Congressional government, which, in turn, results, under twentieth-century conditions, in a negative and vacillating foreign policy, the impairment of our world position, and danger to our national safety. This situation has been described by a former colleague as the "Frenchification" of the Constitution. By this he means government where power is centered in a national assembly as in the four French republican constitutions. Under this system, the Presidency tends to become ceremonial, executive power virtually disappears, and authority is assumed by parliamentarians, undisciplined by any penalty for repudiating the executive, divided into numerous groups no one of which commands decisive power, and unable and unequipped to lead the country in a sustained, complex, and difficult course of action. The foreign policy emerging from such a situation is formed by slogans and emotion; decisions represent the lowest common denominator of the groups in the legislative assembly. The vital issues, which are always painful, are evaded and decision postponed until events decide them.

We are familiar enough with this course of events as it has appeared and reappeared in French history from the First Republic to the Fourth. But perhaps we do not understand how closely our own situation approximates the French when the Presidential powers fall from hands not strong enough to wield them. For these powers are not self-executing. They cannot be exercised by a committee. They reside in and depend upon the quality of one man. This has been stated by one who held and knew how to use them:

> Many diverse elements entered into the creation of the office, springing, as it did, from the parent idea of the separation of powers.
> There was the firm conviction of such powerful and shrewd minds as that of John Adams that the greatest protection against unlimited power lay in an executive secured against the encroachments of a national assembly. Then there were the fears of those who suspected a plot to establish a monarchy on these shores. Others believed that the experience under the Confederation showed above all the need of stability through a strong central administration. Finally, there was the need for compromise among these and many other views.
> The result was a compromise—a compromise which that shrewd observer, Alexis de Tocqueville, over a hundred and twenty years ago, believed would not work. He thought that the Presidential office was too weak. The President, he thought, was at the mercy of Congress. The President could recommend, to be sure, but he had no power and the Congress had. The Congress could disregard his recommendations, overrule his vetoes, reject his nominations. De Tocqueville thought that no man of parts, worthy of leadership, would accept so feeble a role.
> This was not a foolish view and there was much in our early history which tended to bear it out. But there is a power in the course of events which plays its own part. In this case again, Justice Holmes's epigram proved true. He said a page of history is worth a whole volume of logic. And as the pages of history were written they unfolded powers in the Presidency not explicitly found in Article II of the Constitution.

In the first place, the President became the leader of a political party. The party under his leadership had to be dominant enough to put him in office. This political party leadership was the last thing the Constitution contemplated. The President's election was not intended to be mixed up in the hurley-burley of partisan politics. . . . The people were to choose wise and respected men who would meet in calm seclusion and choose a President. The runner-up would be Vice President.

All of this went by the board—though most of the original language remains in the Constitution. Out of the struggle and tumult of the political arena a new and different President emerged—the man who led a political party to victory and retained in his hands the power of party leadership. That is, he retained it, like the sword Excalibur, if he could wrest it from the scabbard and wield it.

Another development was connected with the first. As the President came to be elected by the whole people, he became responsible to the whole people. . . . Our whole people looked to him for leadership, and not confined within the limits of a written document. Every hope and every fear of his fellow citizens, almost every aspect of their welfare and activity, falls within the scope of his concern—indeed, falls within the scope of his duty. Only one who has held that office can really appreciate that. It is the President's responsibility to look at all questions from the point of view of the whole people. His written and spoken word commands national—often international—attention.

These powers which are not explicitly written into the Constitution are powers which no President can pass on to his successor. They go only to him who can take and use them. (Harry S. Truman, New York "Times," May 9, 1954.)

We have had Presidents who have not exercised the Presidential power. It will not exhaust the list to mention Presidents Pierce, Buchanan, Grant, Harding, and Coolidge. When Presidential default occurs it is not correct to say that Congress steps into the vacant place. Attempts are made to do so, but they cannot fully succeed since Congress is not designed, organized, or equipped for executive leadership.

Aside from the obvious reason that so large a body, designed to be a check upon action, cannot be the leader in action, there is another reason highly relevant to our present inquiry. It is that our two-party system cloaks a multiparty reality. There is a saying—not wholly accurate—that strict party votes occur only on the organization of the House and Senate. But it is true that strict party votes are rare enough to cause considerable comment. Every newspaper reader knows that across the traditional party lines run perhaps even deeper alignments—the farm bloc, the protectionist bloc, the isolationist group, the Southern group (on certain questions), the "liberal group" (on certain questions), the mountain states (on minerals and wool), the public power group, the economy group, and so on.

The conclusion relevant here is that a party leader in Congress is not a leader, so far as foreign affairs is concerned, qualified to speak for the party which he nominally leads. His view is not accepted as any more important or controlling than that of any other member. In the absence of Presidential leadership, Congressional policy must be evolved by negotiation among the groups and with a high appreciation of short-term electoral approval. These conditions are not favorable to understanding or dealing with fundamental realities and issues or to producing continuity of policy and the sober facing of difficult problems requiring costly sacrifices. The Nye Committee did not provide the country with an understanding of the problems left by the First World War or with policies consistent with the security of the United States. It resulted in a withdrawal into "Fortress America" which was no fortress at all, because the incidence of power pressures occurred outside it. And it is there—where the pressures focus—that the United States must exercise its capacity to mold and shape the future.

So we return to the President as the pivotal point, the critical element in reaching decisions on foreign policy. Now the capacity to decide is not a common attribute of mankind. It becomes increasingly rare as the difficulty of the problems increases. The choice becomes one between courses all of which are hard and dangerous. The "right" one, if there is a right one, is quite apt to be the most immediately difficult one. It was certainly so in reaching a decision regarding Korea in June, 1950. In these cases the mind tends to remain suspended between alternatives and to seek escape by postponing the issue. There are always persuasive advocates of opposing courses. "On the one hand" balances "on the other." The problem itself becomes the enemy.

General Marshall understands this very well. Many a time he would burst out in an interminable discussion with, "Gentlemen, don't fight the question. Decide it." And he has often observed that the rarest of all gifts is the capacity for decision.

Many men and some Presidents don't have it. And when this occurs, the consequences are irreparable. It is one of the maladies for which there is no cure, except amputation.

Some years ago a lawyer friend received a call from a man who thanked him for giving him the best advice he had ever received. "You did not take my case," the man explained. "You listened to me, and you said, 'My friend, you are in one hell of a fix.' And," he added, "I was."

So is the country when the function of decision in foreign policy breaks down. For the inescapable result is drift. And it is drift away from the association, the coalition, of free nations which cannot exist without us, and without which we cannot exist as the nation all of us have known. And it is drift in this direction not necessarily from desire—many members of Congress desire quite the opposite—but because policy in association or coalition requires a vast number of coördinated and continuous actions which, for the reasons given, Congress without vigorous executive leadership is not able to provide. This vigorous leadership often involves conflict and competing appeals to the people, the common source of power. This is inherent in the system of the separation of powers, the framers of which did not rate harmony between the executive and legislative branches as highly as some of their successors.

Different Presidents have gone about reaching conclusions and decisions for the conduct of foreign relations in different ways. Some have relied heavily on solitary reflection and study. One can see instances of this in Presidents Jefferson, Lincoln, and Wilson. Some have relied substantially upon advisers not in the established chart of organization. Here one might cite the two Roosevelts. Others have been meticulous in sticking to "channels," of whom President Truman is outstanding. But, however he works, the President must be free to choose the methods most suited to him. He cannot be confined. Particularly, he must not be confined by law. Legislation that a President must consult this, that, or the other person or body will be futile and harmful. He can be given facilities, but he cannot be compelled to use them.

But it can properly be said that some courses are apt to be more successful than others. Successful organization and method will recognize two fundamental truths—the indivisibility of policy and the speciality of the foreign field.

Governmental policy is an integer—political policy, diplomatic, military, economic, fiscal. It is all one. Each depends upon, is stimulated and limited by the others. The history of our government decisions in the year 1950 is a clinic for any who wish to spell out this thesis. But it will hardly be disputed in theory, while it is very apt to be disregarded in practice. And there will always be argument about the hierarchy of importance. Do we cut the pattern according to the cloth or do we cut the cloth according to the pattern? And where do we find the pattern? But the first requirement is that there must be a pattern.

While this is true, it is also true that, despite popular belief, the field of foreign affairs is a field of special competence. Those who have spent their lives in the study of foreign nations and peoples know more about them than those who have not, just as physicians or physicists know more about their fields of special study. They often make mistakes, and bad ones. We are under no compulsion to take their advice. But, where our lives are at stake, as between tossing a coin and consulting the specialists, we would be wise to do the latter.

Now it is an interesting fact that the Secretary of State is the senior member of the Cabinet. He is the senior member because this cabinet office was the first to be created upon the formation of our government. And it was the first to be created because then, as now, our relations with foreign nations were the most pressing of all problems with which our government had to deal. This has not always been true in the years which intervened. But it was true then, and it is true now.

Whatever primacy one attaches to our relations with the world beyond our borders, it is plain that a President needs continuous and knowledgeable advice about them. The Department of State exists for this purpose, is highly competent to perform it, and should be the principal, unifying, and final source of advice and recommendation. Unifying and final in this sense, that reports and recommendations from all sources, official and unofficial, come to the President—some of them good, more of them plausible. All of these should be referred to and reported on by the Department of State, which must live with the problem. Its view may be rejected, but it should be heard.

So far we have spoken of a "department" and about "its" view. But a department is made up of thousands of people. It cannot advise the President. And it rarely has a view. Here enters the Secretary of State—an unenviable figure. As Henry Adams pointed out, he is destined to be a pariah with the Congress because he represents problems which the Congress wishes to forget. Votes can be lost but not gained through foreign policy.

Nevertheless he has a place, and an important one, in the making of decisions. It is not the one most photographed and publicized—his exhausting flights to conferences, his greeting of visiting dignitaries, his appearance before committees of Congress and the public as a spokesman for the Administration. His other and essential role concerns both the special knowledge of the foreign field and the synthesis of foreign policy into a unified governmental policy.

In the first aspect he must draw from the Department of State in usable form its full knowledge and wisdom upon the many matters which press for decision. He should distrust conclusions, his own or others', when they provide answers too facile and pat, but should rather spur and encourage his departmental colleagues to bring together all their varied knowledge and points of view so that all possibilities are tested against the most stringent criticism. He must keep them headed into the problem and present to them the other governmental factors involved which fall outside their field of special competence, but which must weigh heavily with the President.

Out of this method of work will come recommendations from the foreign affairs point of view influenced by, but not wholly coördinated with, the limiting factors of our capabilities in the economic, fiscal, military, and domestic political fields. This final reconciliation must be made by the President. He should be kept fully informed of the progress of the work so that issues are not presented to him suddenly and at a late stage when choices have narrowed, and so that the President's thought may be fully reflected in the work of preparation. But, before the matter comes to the President for action, much can be done to assure that all his advisers have understood and considered one another's points of view and the whole scope of limitations and capabilities applicable to the problem.

Much of this is accomplished by consultation between cabinet colleagues and through such valuable interdepartmental machinery as the National Advisory Council on financial matters and the National Security Council on security matters. It would unduly extend this article to go into these established channels for coördinating policy. But one matter should be mentioned which defies formal organization, but which is absolutely essential. It concerns habits of work and confidence and collaboration between officers of different departments.

One of the curious and toughly resistant characteristics of government departments is the tendency of their people to isolate themselves from other departments and to regard persons outside their ranks with something amounting, on occasion, to suspicion and hostility. It may seem extraordinary, but it is nevertheless true, that not until General Marshall's tenure as Secretary of Defense had the Secretary of State and his senior officers met with the Secretary of Defense and the Joint Chiefs of Staff for continuous discussion and development of policy. And yet foreign policy and military policy divorced from one another are both operating in the field of phantasy.

From September, 1950, until January, 1953—I am not informed thereafter—officers of the two Departments worked in the closest and most loyal coöperation and greatly to the public good. This does not happen automatically; it requires constant attention and effort from all concerned and especially from the top. For both Departments have internal differences springing from perfectly proper differences of emphasis and interests, either from the services, in one case, or the geographical divisions, in the other. Both desire to keep their differences within the family. But it is useful and often most productive to bring them out in discussion, provided those in the discussion preserve confidence. The value of these years of common work in mutual enlightenment, confidence, and advancement of policy and action cannot be overstated.

The same relationship existed with the Economic Coöperation Administration and with its successor, the Mutual Security Agency, and to a lesser, but useful, degree with other Departments having functions in the foreign field—Treasury, Commerce, Agriculture, and Labor.

The purpose of all this was not necessarily to get agreed recommendations and papers, but to get understanding; and, where there were differences, to have them brought out, not covered up, and to have them intelligent and intelligible differences. One can always get an agreed paper by increasing the vagueness and generality of its statements. The staff of any interdepartmental committee has a fatal weakness for this type of agreement by exhaustion. But such agreements are no good and of no service to the President, if he has the capacity for decision. What he needs to know are the real issues, honestly presented, with extraneous matter stripped away.

We come back then to where we started—to the President. The decisions are his. Helped by his departmental advisers and their staffs, helped by his own Executive Office—the Bureau of the Budget, the Economic Advisers, and so forth—ultimately he must decide. The volume of work which should be done is appalling. It cannot be got through by listening to oral presentations, or "briefings," or reading one-page memoranda. It has to be sweated out. The facts have to be mastered, the choices and their consequences understood—so far as consequences can be understood; and then upon "judgments and intuitions more subtle than any articulate major premise" the decision made.

Dear Harry:

Sorry to have been so long in answering your letter of June 23rd; I have been away. Thanks for the McCarthy material. I am beginning to think he is in real trouble with the Watkins Committee.

Tell Anita that part of the reference has to do with a movie.

Dear Ed:

As a fellow alumnus and after our delightful weekend with the Roots at Hamilton, I feel that I can so address you. Besides, I have an idea there's a better chance of this note reaching your desk by doing so.

Undoubtedly you have a copy of the attached documented record on McCarthy, though possibly not. I saw it referred to in a Kiplinger letter a few weeks ago and what was said about it rather intrigued me so I sent for a few copies. This one has your name on it for keeps, or for you to dispose of if you wish.

I have read only the chapters on McCarthy's war record and tax troubles which to me are damning to a degree I never realized before. In themselves, and there is no reason to doubt the facts presented, they show why McCarthy wants his past left alone. He's a hard man to get on the witness stand and I don't wonder.

Our best to Janet and some day Casey, we hope. Anita is still puzzling over your "Molly of Hamilton" description of her, as am I, and you'll have to let us in on the reference before too long. The suspense is becoming quite unbearable.

With all good wishes in which Anita joins,

Yours sincerely,

Harry D. Yates.

Dear Mr. Murrow:

Presuming that you have a native sympathy with things Mt. Holyoke-ish, I would like to ask a favor of you — very small size.

Our Westchester Club gives a House Tour every fall to raise money for a scholarship. We are looking now for homes in Scarsdale with owners who will possibly open them for our 1955 House Tour. Our biggest problem at present is in locating a "name" home to give our tour the final touch. There are many many lovely homes to select from, but each year we have also had a NAME home too — one year George F. Skouras, another Red Barber.

Mount Holyoke Club

It occurred to me that you might be able to aid us in our search for someone well known.

Should it be that you were in Scarsdale, we'd like to have someone here within the program; next 6 mos. on Person-to-Person, that would not hurt our cause at all. And if mention were to be made that said person's home was to be included in our annual House Tour - oh-la-la!

We will be delighted with any ideas you have on the subject - the only lead we have so far is Harry Winston, the jeweler, but haven't followed that down yet. We find most people very honored at our request, though. Thank you so much.

May 28, 1954

Dear Friends:

As fellow Democrats, we believe you are entitled to know why we are supporting the election of United States Senator Thomas H. Kuchel on June 8. All of us, like you, are registered Democrats. Most of us have been so for all of our lives. It was only after the most painstaking study of the candidates, their records and the issues at stake that we reached the conclusion that we could not in good conscience vote for the candidate who has received the official Democratic endorsement.

It is our belief that Sam Yorty is the candidate of the radical wing of the Party—the Jimmy Roosevelt wing—which has led the Party to defeat in California again and again and again. Jimmy Roosevelt appears to be the handpicked candidate of Yorty to succeed him in the 28th District and their candidacies were announced together. Mr. Yorty himself has been unsuccessful when a candidate for important public office. This is from his record:

—Defeated for the Los Angeles City Council in 1939.

—Defeated for United States Senator in 1940, receiving 74,332 votes out of a total of 1,007,926 cast on the Democratic ballot.

—Defeated for Mayor of Los Angeles in 1945, receiving only 10,397 out of a total of 273,322.

The reason for Mr. Yorty's defeats is not difficult to find. A study of his record since he entered public life in 1936 shows him consistent only in his inconsistency. WHAT DO YOU THINK OF THIS?

—He co-authored a bill in the State Legislature in 1937 to repeal the California Criminal Syndicalism Act. This law makes it a crime to advocate the overthrow of our Government by force and violence. This action alone should be reason enough for Democrats to deny him our vote.

—According to the July 26, 1937 issue of the WESTERN WORKER, he was to address a meeting of the Communist-dominated Workers' Alliance in Los Angeles, after which a group of agitators were to march on the W.P.A. Headquarters and the City Hall.

—According to the July 18, 1938 issue of the Communist-line PEOPLE'S WORLD, he was reported as planning to march that day in a picket line at the British and Italian Consulates in Los Angeles, along with Leo Gallagher, who was then candidate for Secretary of State of California on the Communist ticket.

—He extended greetings to the PEOPLE'S WORLD in its January 1, 1938 issue in the same column with Harry Bridges, Upton Sinclair, and Anita Whitney and William Schneiderman, State Chairman and Secretary, respectively, of the Communist Party. This is the same Schneiderman who was tried and convicted in the Federal Court at Los Angeles in 1952, during a Democratic Administration, of conspiracy to advocate the overthrow of the United States Government by force and violence.

—He received the endorsement of the Communist-line PEOPLE'S WORLD as a candidate for the Los Angeles City Council in the May 2, 1939 election.

His character has been appraised by a staff writer of the Communist-line PEOPLE'S WORLD in its issue of August 4, 1949, wherein he is referred to as "the legislative spokesman for social democracy"—whatever that may be—with this, among other comments:

"His chummy relationships . . . are a good key to the smart, dapper little character. Because smart he is, and very adept at this business of making like a true champion of the people. Take his voting records. He's the best example at large today of the fact that a legislator cannot be evaluated entirely by his voting record."

Mr. Yorty has been, as we see it, on both sides of the fence. Today Mr. Yorty declares himself the staunch foe of Communism. We hope he is but we are far from convinced.

Contrast this record with the accomplishments of California's incumbent United States Senator, Thomas H. Kuchel, as outlined in this pamphlet. Confronted with the necessity of choosing between these two candidates, we had but one possible choice. We will work and vote to keep Thomas H. Kuchel California's United States Senator.

And to you and every other registered Democrat, we extend a warm invitation to join with us so as to assure the election of United States Senator Thomas H. Kuchel on June 8th.

Sincerely yours,
DEMOCRATS FOR U. S. SENATOR THOMAS H. KUCHEL

By Henry S. Dornheim
Chairman for Southern California

Senator Kuchel lunches with then Governor Earl Warren and California Labor Leaders at the State Fair on Labor Day, 1953. Left to right: Ed Miller, National Secretary, Culinary Workers Union; Lloyd Mashburn, then acting Secretary of Labor, California; then Governor Earl Warren; Senator Kuchel; C. J. Haggerty, Secretary, California State Federation of Labor; and Tom Pitts, President, California State Federation of Labor.

U.S. Senator Thomas H. Kuchel has faithfully served California and the nation for 18 of his 43 years...

Californians know U.S. Senator Thomas H. Kuchel. They know where he stands. They know they can trust him. Since 1936, his life has been devoted to public service in the interests of this State and the nation.

BORN IN 1910 in Anaheim, California, of English, German and Irish descent, Tom Kuchel is a third generation Californian. His grandfather was one of the pioneer citizens who helped to found that city in 1859. His father owned and edited the Anaheim Gazette for some 48 years and in these soundly American surroundings, Tom Kuchel grew to manhood. He attended the public schools in Anaheim and graduated from the University of Southern California, where he also received his law degree. He is married and has one child, a 9-year old daughter.

WHEN ONLY 26 YEARS OLD, he was elected to the State Assembly from Orange County, re-elected in 1938 and then elected to the State Senate for two terms. In 1942, while a State Senator, he volunteered in the U.S. Navy, serving until released from active duty in 1945. Appointed to the office of State Controller by then

ELECT A MAN YOU KNOW YOU

Governor Earl Warren in 1946, he was elected to that office in November of the same year by the largest vote ever received by a candidate for Controller. In 1950, he repeated with overwhelming popular approval, polling about 3 million Democratic, Republican and non-partisan votes.

CALIFORNIA VOTERS have been quick to recognize his honesty, sincerity and outstanding capacity for public service. Tom Kuchel has never been defeated for public office. Both victories as State Controller were won in the primary elections—Senator Kuchel receiving both Democratic and Republican nominations.

HE ENTERED THE UNITED STATES SENATE in 1952 from the State of California, again appointed by then Governor Earl Warren, who said of him: "State Controller Kuchel has all the qualifications to become an outstanding senator. He combines youth with a long and honorable career of public service." The truth of the Governor's words has been amply proved by the record.

THROUGHOUT THIS LONG CAREER OF PUBLIC SERVICE, Senator Kuchel has established an unquestioned reputation for integrity and level-headed courage—for clear thinking and sound judgment—for devotion to the cause of good, clean American government—for enthusiastic support for human rights, regardless of color, creed or social position.

IN WASHINGTON, SENATOR KUCHEL has worked tirelessly—and with great success—in the service of California and those who live and labor here. He has fought for the business-like conduct of government, for sound economy and tax reduction for the individual, for those who need it most. With his background of experience as a legislator, state official and U.S. Senator, he knows the State of California and its people and its problems as thoroughly as any man in public life today. All Californians will approve of his statement that the United States should not be expected single-handed to attempt to put out the brush fires of Communism all over the world, including Indo-China.

HIS OPPOSITION TO COMMUNISM has been unwavering throughout his entire career. Senator Kuchel has well said: "Elimination of Communists and subversives from our Government should not be a partisan problem. It is an American problem."

SENATOR KUCHEL HAS GAINED THE RESPECT of his fellow senators of both political parties by his hard work and his faithful devotion to his responsibilities. He has established an amazing record for a new member of either the Senate or the House from California. His box score is:

—15 Bills pending in the Senate and the House,
— 9 Bills passed by the Senate,
— 7 Bills passed by the Senate and the House and signed into law by the President.

Included in these measures signed by the President are:

—The Tidelands Bills, which will produce millions of dollars in revenues for the State of California.

—The Cotton Quota Bill, which will save $200 millions for California agriculture.

—The Bill eliminating tax immunity for certain corporations which will lighten the tax burden on the small property owner.

—Flood control bills, which mean both protection for our citizens and increased payrolls for California workers.

By contrast, his principal Democratic opponent, with two terms in the House, had introduced 44 Bills, none of which had been enacted into public law as of April 14, 1954.

If there ever was a time when real patriots were needed in Washington, it is now. Senator Thomas H. Kuchel is a real patriot. Vote for him June 8.

THE WHITE HOUSE
WASHINGTON

August 13, 1953

Dear Senator Kuchel:

...Your bill, which I have just approved, demonstrates the high standards of public service by which you are guided, and the concern you have that all of our citizens be treated fairly and the tax burden within the States and local communities be shared on an equitable basis by all.

I believe that the cooperation between the Congress and the Executive this last session, which you helped to make possible, has produced a record of accomplishment of which we can all be justly proud. That record, together with the record which we will make in the next session, will, I am confident, be such as to merit and receive the support of the people in the 1954 Congressional elections.

I am looking forward to seeing you when you return to Washington for the next session.

Sincerely,

Dwight D. Eisenhower

Here's what Ike says about him:

Senator Kuchel stands at the President's side as he signs the Cotton Acreage Quota Bill, the first major law to be approved at this session.

Senator Kuchel has lent his full support to President Eisenhower's great program for building a stronger and better America.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

May 25, 1954

Senator Thomas H. Kuchel
Senate Offices Building
Washington, D. C.

Dear Tommy:

When my running for the Senate was still in the rumor stage, we both agreed that if I did run, we would wage a clean campaign. We have been friends a long time and in politics long enough to know that political differences need not become personal.

In announcing my candidacy, I said: "My campaign will be conducted on a level befitting the importance of the office and the gravity of the issues which confront us.... As time goes on, I hope to have an opportunity to engage in face-to-face debate with my Republican opponent so as to better develop and clarify the issues in the campaign.... Nothing I have said here is intended as a reflection on the personal character or personal integrity of my Republican opponent. Our differences are political not personal."

In this campaign I have stuck to the issues, seldom referred to you, and never attacked you personally. I was therefore doubly surprised and disappointed to learn of your plan to mail a last-minute carefully fabricated "smear" to Democratic voters.

On May 15, a disgusted Republican handed my office a copy of your campaign pamphlet entitled "An Open Letter to Registered Democrats." Among other things, it contains a scurrilous attack upon me. This attack is in the form of a letter dated May 28, 1954.

The brochure was prepared weeks before the date on the "smear" letter. This makes it obvious that you are planning to use the letter at the last minute in order to deliberately deceive the voters. Such tactics are, or should be, beneath the dignity of the office you now hold by appointment, and to which you are currently seeking election.

The "smear" letter contains an ingenious and insidious collection of innuendos, half-truths, and distortions. Sentences and paragraphs are lifted out of context, names are deleted, and deliberate lies brazenly used. Your falsification of the date of the letter, I repeat, is irrefutable evidence of your intent to deprive the voters of sufficient time to learn the truth before election day, June 8.

Without making a detailed refutation of each lie and distortion in the purported letter, I do want to refer to a few examples. For instance, the letter says: "It is our belief that Sam Yorty is the candidate of the radical wing of the party...." You know this is not true. Even when my candidacy was only in the discussion stage the Communist press commenced violent attacks upon me. When I announced that I would run, and requested the endorsement of the Democratic Convention, a "stop-Yorty" movement was started by Bert Coffey, who has since admitted his former membership in the Communist Party.

Both Fred Arnold, political editor of Hearst's Herald and Express, and C. Lyn Fox, political editor of Hearst's Call-Bulletin, saw fit to refer to the reason for this "stop-Yorty" movement. In his column of February 9, 1954, Mr. Fox said the "stop-Yorty" leaders "didn't like Sam's outspoken attitude on Reds and fellow-travelers in government." If you are interested, Mr. Brownell can supply you with the F.B.I. records of professional Communists who posed as Democrats at the Democratic Convention and tried unsuccessfully to block my endorsement. Of course, you are painfully aware of the fact that I have the wholehearted support of all but a small extreme left wing of the Democratic Party. Isn't this why you are in desperation resorting to gutter level "smear" tactics while refusing every invitation to meet me openly in face-to-face debate?

(MORE)

Most of the other carefully selected items in your "smear" letter refer to meetings or Communist press articles dating back to 1937-38, when the Democratic Party in California, as well as many labor and civic organizations, were heavily infiltrated by Communists posing as American liberals. No Democratic leader of those days could attend or speak at a large number of meetings without unknowingly and unintentionally being in the same room or even on the same platform with secret Communists. When a Democratic Governor took office in 1939, these Communists tried to move into the State government, particularly the State Relief Administration. At that time we were both members of the Legislature.

I soon sensed what was happening and introduced the resolution which created California's first official state committee to combat subversive activities. I was appointed chairman of the committee and led the fight against the Communists during my two remaining years in the Legislature. You know as well as I do that of all the Democratic leaders in our State, I am the one most hated by the Communists. While you remained passive, I was leading the fight against the Communists. You are passive even now except for a few campaign speeches. I am still fighting them. They are still fighting me. Your disgusting attempt to link me with my bitterest enemies involves an outright lie of which you are well aware.

In his column of December 1, 1953, Mr. C. Lyn Fox recalled that I was the one who "sparked a drive that drove the Reds out of the State Relief Administration and broke their toe-hold in state government." Do you mean to accuse the distinguished political editor of Hearst's Call-Bulletin of untruthful writing?

The Communists are in reality helping you in this campaign. This is because they are much more intensely opposed to me. Long before the Democratic Convention they boasted that if I were endorsed by the Democrats, they would file another candidate. On the last filing day and during the final hour, Leo Gallagher filed against me on the Democratic ticket. He was formerly the official Communist Party candidate for Secretary of State. He is obviously trying to split the Democratic vote which can only help you. Perhaps you can disclose who is financing his campaign.

Yorty Open Letter

If I wanted to stoop to your tactics, I could draw some inferences from certain of your actions. On July 1, 1953, you voted to cut one billion dollars or 20% from the Administration's budget for Mutual Security Assistance to our free world allies in their fight against Communist aggression. The Communists have always violently opposed Mutual Security programs. Because you withheld your full support from this assistance, does this make you a Communist or a "fellow-traveler"? Such a conclusion would be as logical as your unfounded "smear" against me.

A few more points concerning your "Open Letter to Registered Democrats" should be noted. You have combined in one brochure a picture of President Eisenhower with the type of "smear" attack upon which he has publicly frowned. I wonder if you "cleared" this whole brochure with the President before so using his photograph!

Your brochure also attempts to deceive Democrats into thinking you are supported by the American Federation of Labor. Without authorization you have reproduced a picture of yourself with A. F. of L. leaders. This picture was taken years ago and has no political connotation. You tried to obtain support from the A. F. of L. in this campaign, but they endorsed me. Mr. Thomas Pitts, President of the California State Federation of Labor, has informed me that you reproduced his picture in your brochure without his knowledge or consent. Such tactics hardly indicate qualification for the office of United States Senator.

I know the results of polls have made you disheartened and desperate, but isn't one's honor and self-respect worth enough to make honorable defeat preferable to dishonorable victory? You must search for the answer in your own conscience.

Perhaps you would be well advised to think twice before mailing to Democrats this brochure which is an insult to their intelligence. It may prove a political boomerang and certainly it will discredit you.

Sincerely,

/s/ Sam

Dear Ed:

Our long-time correspondence and your continuing fearless reporting leads me to believe that you will want to use an item on the enclosed material. I know that you are very busy, but I hope you will take time to read the enclosed and give it your consideration.

I think it particularly interesting that Senator Kuchel has seen fit to use a picture of the President of the United States in a mailing piece which contains this scurrilous attack against Congressman Yorty.

As always, my congratulations on your courageous and competent news reporting.

My best regards.

Sincerely,

I don't see how I can do anything about this matter because of the split network situation. The Ford commercials originate out of Chicago, and I can't very well put in a plug for Ford's name over the commercial for Amoco and Hamm Beer.

Dear Mr. Murrow:

Please forgive me for taking so long to write and thank you for your very generous handling of my campaign in Southern California. As you may have heard, we were fortunate enough to carry the Republican nomination by a 2-1 majority over Senator Tenney.

We have had an amazing response in telegrams and letters to your program, and we are trying very hard to answer all of those letters which we have received. I felt that the issues which came up in this campaign were definitely of national importance so that we were additionally grateful to you for having made them known to your tremendous audience throughout the nation.

Sometime when you are in Southern California I should be very flattered if you could call and give me an opportunity to thank you personally for your program.

Sincerely,

My dear Mr. Murrow:

Thank you so much for the time you gave Mr. Bronfman and myself yesterday afternoon. We are both very grateful.

I'm quite sure that Mr. Bronfman can be of considerable assistance to you in so far as helping to direct you to the right people and places concerned with the cultural development of Israel.

My best wishes for a successful trip, and I shall look forward with great interest to the telecast on the subject we discussed when it appears on my television screen.

Thank you once again.

Samuel Youngheart, an old friend of mine who is now associated with Warwick & Legler, called today to ask me to try to arrange an appointment for him and Mr. Alan Bronfman to meet with you. Mr. Bronfman is one of the heads of Seagrams and is also vitally interested in the Hebrew University in Israel.

Their reason for wanting to meet with you is based on information which they have that you are doing a special show on Israel and will go there in person. Mr. Bronfman feels that he would be neglecting his duties if he did not give you some background on the Hebrew University so that when you are there you would know about its importance in the scheme of things.

I told Mr. Youngheart that I was not sure whether you were going ahead with the program on Israel, but that I would write a memorandum to you suggesting that you call him and arrange for the appointment in case the project is on the schedule. Mr. Youngheart can be reached at Murray Hill 4-5800.

Dear Darryl:

Your letter to Ed Murrow of June fourth has been passed along to me together with a copy of his reply to you of June ninth, and I am a bit puzzled as to which program in the YOU ARE THERE series you had reference.

On April fourth we did present "The Opening of King Tut's Tomb," but our dramatization did not advert to the Pharaoh or Cheops. Inasmuch as this is the only Egyptian subject which we have presented in the series since it first went on the air a year and a half ago, I imagine there must have been other aspects of the presentation which were called to your attention.

What you have to say in your letter about THE EGYPTIAN and Akhnaton is fascinating, and the latter might well provide a basis for one of our programs. Our schedules are set months in advance, however, and we are presently programmed through the beginning of next April. I am attaching a schedule of the subjects we shall undertake during the fall and winter of next year.

Needless to say, I shall be looking forward to THE EGYPTIAN.

Warmest regards, as always, to Virginia and yourself.

Sincerely,

S/Wm. Dozier
